PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 81st CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

SENATE

TUESDAY, JANUARY 3, 1950

The 3d day of January being the day prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for the annual meeting of Congress, the second session of the Eighty-first Congress commenced this day.

The Senate assembled in its Chamber at the Capitol.

ALBEN W. BARKLEY, of Kentucky, Vice President of the United States, called the Senate to order at 12 o'clock meridian.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following

PRAYER

Our Father God, with the gateway of an old year having noiselessly closed behind us, we come this noontide to open a new volume of personal and national responsibility. We humbly bow, this hallowed moment, with the solemn realization that no changes in calendars or sessions or chambers of debate and decision alter the fact of facts that until we find Thee and art found of Thee we begin at no beginning and come to no ending.

In an hour when such vast issues are at stake may those here called to high places of state, conscious of the great tradition in which they stand and the desperate times of which they are the servants, rise to greatness of vision and soul as the anxious eyes of all the earth are upon this Capital. Maintain in us the fidelity of those to whom much has been given and from whom much will be required. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

DEATH OF SENATOR REED, OF KANSAS

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I rise to announce the death of the former senior Senator from Kansas, CLYDE M. REED. I send to the desk a resolution, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 192), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow and deep regret the announcement of the death of Hon. CLYDE M. REED, late a Senator from the State of Kansas.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate, at the conclusion of its business today, do adjourn.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, CLYDE REED and I were elected to the Senate at the same time 11 years ago, and were reelected at the same time in 1944. We were close friends during all the time he served here.

The Senate has lost one of its most able and determined leaders. He was a man who, at all times, by his character and actions, assisted in maintaining the tone of the Senate as it ought to be.

CLYDE REED had had great experience in public life. After a long period in which he served with the railroads, he became a member of the Public Utilities Commission of Kansas. He was thoroughly familiar with the entire transportation problem. He served as Governor of Kansas. When he became a Member of the Senate he was made a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee and for a time its chairman. His advice and assistance on transportation questions were relied upon to such a degree that it can be said, I think, that he determined the transportation policy of the country during the time he was here.

He was a man of absolute impartiality. I believe he approached every legislative problem and every question of personalities with a desire to be absolutely and completely fair, and it came to be generally recognized that he was a man of sound and impartial judgment.

He was at all times, of course, a hard fighter when dealing with those problems in which he was particularly interested and on which he was an authority. He was always a diligent worker. He was always unassuming, and never sought a position to which he was not entitled.

The Senate has lost a very able Member. The Nation and the State of Kansas have lost a great citizen. I myself have lost a very dear and intimate friend.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Kansas will not be acted upon finally until routine matters incumbent upon the Senate to act on today have been disposed of. Senators may address themselves to the resolution, either now or later.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I wish to pay my tribute of respect and high regard to the late senior Senator from Kansas, my friend of many years, CLYDE REED, of whom I have many fine memories. BOB TAFT has spoken intimately and finely of him, and I add my voice to supplement that testimony.

I knew him before he came to the Senate, and in this great body I was privileged to serve as a comember with him on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

A marked feature of his life in that committee and the work he did there was his truly prodigious supply of factual information respecting the railroads and all matters affecting transportation. His counsel and aid will be sorely missed as we carry on.

I go back in memory to September 29, which I think was the last day he appeared with us on the floor of the Senate in the old Supreme Court room. He turned to me and said, "Charlie, my wife has had a fall at home and injured herself. We have been married 60 years. I am going back to Kansas tonight to be with her, and I am not coming back."

That was a man speaking, a husband speaking his feelings born of great and true and abiding affection down through the years, after 60 years of married life. He expressed the sentiments of love and affection of a good man for a good wife. He paid that tribute to her, then wended his way back, and joined her in that family circle.

On November 8 the Lord took him and he is now but a memory. How prophetic were those words, "I am not coming back." He is not coming back in the flesh, but CLYDE REED will live for days and years to come so long as we who were his colleagues are a part of the Senate of the United States.

And so in the mystic presence of the body and the soul and the spirit of CLYDE REED I take his hand today in behalf of my fellow Members, and I say "Thy hand, good friend."

May the service of our days, in various moods and ways,
Prove to those who follow in our train, not valueless nor vain.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I remember vividly the day CLYDE REED was sworn in as a Member of the Senate. The news of his death came as a great shock to me. He was a man of wisdom and of great knowledge. He was a citizen of principle. He was a public servant of influence because he had courage and devotion to duty. I shall miss him personally, and we shall all miss him here as a valuable Member of the Senate.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, the Senate in general, and the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in particular, will greatly miss the wise counsel of Senator CLYDE REED, of Kansas. A public servant, unique in some respects because of his long experience in the development of the regulation of public utilities, one of the major problems of the last three decades, and later as Governor of Kansas, in his long service in the Senate he earned the respect and confidence of his colleagues and of the country.

As a junior member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I considered it a privilege and an opportunity to consult him on the varied and complex problems which confronted our country, and I count it a great loss that we shall not have his continued service in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, although I did not have the good fortune to have known CLYDE REED quite so long as had some of my colleagues, nevertheless, when I came to the Senate in 1945 and was assigned to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, in a few short years I learned to know him quite well, indeed, quite intimately. I had a deep affection for CLYDE REED. We served and worked together on subcommittees. There was never any sort of partisanship in the work we did in those subcommittees during the Eightieth Congress, or in the work we did in many subcommittees in the Eighty-first Congress.

Mr. President, in the death of CLYDE REED I have suffered a real personal loss, because he was serving with me on a subcommittee which was studying the surface transportation of the country. He was a great American sent forth from his great State of Kansas. I am sure he earned for himself the respect, the admiration, and the esteem and affection of every Member of the Senate.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I join my colleagues of the Senate in honoring the man and paying tribute to the memory of our recently departed colleague the senior Senator from Kansas, CLYDE MARTIN REED.

I rise to speak because Senator REED was a neighbor of mine and a friend of mine. Our friendship dated back to the year 1927, in connection with matters pending in the Legislatures of Nebraska and Kansas.

As we begin a new session of the Congress in these critical times, we shall miss his counsel and advice, for truly it may be said of Senator REED that he was a man who served his country well.

He devoted his entire career to the public interest.

He contributed much to the American heritage.

He was a builder for the good of our country.

To few men out of our population comes the opportunity to devote themselves to well-nigh full-time service to their country.

Senator REED was, in many respects, a pioneer and as such contributed to the American way of life. It is for those who follow to preserve this American heritage in a world convulsed by clashing ideologies and, indeed, threatened by a revival of philosophies of the Dark Ages.

When CLYDE MARTIN REED was born in Champaign, Ill., on October 19, 1871, he joined the pioneers of the West. Four years later he moved with his family to Labette County, Kans., and, after receiving a common-school education, began a career of public service in which he was giving his all up to the very moment of his passing away.

He taught school for a year and then began 28 years of effort in building and improving transportation service in the Railway Mail Branch of the Post Office Department, rising through all grades to be field superintendent of divisions in many cities. He served as Superintendent of the Railway Adjustment Division in the Post Office Department.

He turned to publication and active management of a newspaper in his home town of Parsons, Kans., and, as such, contributed to the enlightenment of the people. Through many Kansas State offices, he carried on, constantly seeking to improve the lot of his fellow countrymen, as a member of the Kansas Court of Industrial Relations, as chairman of the Kansas Public Utilities Commission, and from 1929 to 1931, as Governor of Kansas.

We all appreciate the importance of transportation, the linking of distant places together, in building and unifying our country. In this important field, Senator REED was an expert with few equals.

He was an authority on transportation systems and procedures. Many of them, which have been adopted and are now a part of our Nation's great system of transportation, were initiated by him. They are now a part of our daily lives and our daily customs. They are taken for granted.

Upon entering this body in 1938, he carried on, specializing in the problems of transportation that have become very complex as our population has increased. But Senator REED's vision for a better America went beyond providing the means for movement of our people and goods from place to place.

In the whole range of public problems, he left his imprint.

Mr. President, I join in the sentiment so eloquently expressed by my colleague the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] when he said that though CLYDE REED in the flesh has left us, his spirit is with us still.

For my part, and drawing upon the many years it was my privilege to know him and admire his kindly, friendly feeling toward all men, I like to think of him as a great pioneer in our beloved land, as one who has contributed to the American heritage. And as our beloved Nation enters upon a new year, and our Congress begins a new session—to which all of us are looking forward—I shall strive to draw upon the works and words of CLYDE REED for inspiration and guidance.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, before action shall be had on the resolution with respect to the death of our esteemed friend and colleague from Kansas, I desire to add a few words of comment and of tribute to his memory. It was my good fortune to serve with him on one of the committees of the Senate some few years ago, namely, the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. In his service on that committee the Senator from Kansas, Mr. REED, demonstrated a unique knowledge of the subject of post offices, of the postal transportation system, and of allied matters. I think it therefore appropriate that his peculiar knowledge along these lines should be emphasized in addition to his grasp of the other subjects to which reference has been made by other Senators.

Mr. President, I observed also his thoroughness. Whatever Senator REED did, he did well. To him it was no mere figure of speech that whatever is worth doing is worth doing well.

It was my privilege, Mr. President, to be present at the funeral services of our distinguished friend. There I learned, from the beautiful and appropriate remarks which were made by an old friend of his, something of the feeling entertained for him by his fellow citizens in Kansas. My State is a neighbor State of Kansas. We of Missouri realized much of the greatness of Senator REED by reason of our nearness to his own commonwealth. As I heard, however, in his home city of Parsons, Kans., on Armistice Day, 1949, the recital of how his friends and neighbors regarded him, how they venerated and loved him for his integrity, for his fearlessness, for his ruggedness, and for his independence of character, I realized more than ever before the innate greatness of CLYDE REED, of Kansas.

Today, Mr. President, as a Member of this body and, as a friend of his, I express my deep sense of personal loss and join with other Senators in mourning his departure.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I rise to make a few remarks, having announced a few moments ago the passing of the senior Senator from Kansas, CLYDE M. REED. It touches me profoundly as I hear the Members of the Senate of the United States speak words of commendation in his behalf. In his home State of Kansas, CLYDE REED was known as a man who never compromised or shirked a responsibility in a public trust. He was fearless. He was courageous. He was independent. He was respected.

When he passed away, November 8, my State suffered a great loss. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL] has just remarked about the occasion of his funeral, on Armistice Day last, in my State. On that occasion Frederick W. Brinkerhoff, who was a lifetime friend of Senator REED, a fellow editor, and prominent citizen of Kansas, delivered an address. It typifies the esteem and respect in which the late Senator was held in my home State. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to place in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the complete address by Mr. Brinkerhoff.

I close by referring to the closing words of Mr. Brinkerhoff, when he so stirringly said:

CLYDE M. REED is absent—absent on leave. CLYDE M. REED, the most romantic political leader of his generation in Kansas, the most colorful warrior in the battles of the ballots by means of which democracy chooses its spokesmen and defines its course, the statesman of profound mind, restless energy and rugged honesty, the man unafraid.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Kansas to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by Mr. Brinkerhoff is granted.

The address is as follows:

To CLYDE M. REED the people of Kansas gave their assignments for highest public service and their endowment of supreme confidence. They made him the chief executive of their State. They made him a Senator of the United States. They committed to his hands these stations of loftiest honor and greatest responsibility. They could do no more in recognition of ability and willingness for public service. The commission which he received from the people of Kansas, CLYDE M. REED now has returned to them. The record thereon inscribed is unsullied. It is the story of substantial achievements. It tells of official tasks that were performed with matchless skill. It shows a zealous and persistent loyalty to the obligations of his oaths of office. Everywhere on it are the imprints that are the unimpeachable evidence of dauntless courage, high intelligence, amazing ability, hard work and constant fidelity to the sound principles upon which he based and built his career.

No other statesman ever had a keener appreciation of the obligations which a public official owes to those who either directly or indirectly have put him in official station. There were fundamentals in his conception of public service. These included courage, independence, industry, integrity, veracity, and candor. Strict adherence to them throughout his entire career in public office brought to CLYDE REED time after time difficult and discouraging situations, the harsh words of enemies, the kindly criticism of friends and with less frequency than should have been true, the outspoken approval of the public. But no words of condemnation, no challenge of his sagacity and no charge of incompetency ever bothered him in the discharge of official obligations. Following the line of duty as he saw it, he was never affected by the assaults of those who would have had him do otherwise. He went straight ahead. It would not be exactly correct to assert that he did not pay attention to unkind things that were said, for he did. It would not be proper to say that attacks on what he did or what he said did not disturb him, for they did. CLYDE REED was human. He was affected by all of the things that touch men generally in their relations with other men. But Mr. REED had an uncanny appreciation of the factors controlling situations. He had a tremendous gift for weighing items to determine their importance. He could detect promptly the shoddy things that appeared daily in the affairs around him. He had an acute understanding of the influences that caused men to do certain things. He had the power to overcome any tendency to devote too much attention to adversaries. One of his type—vigorous, dynamic, positive, and unrestrained by any concern for self-preservation—could easily have been ruined. Giving attention to every attack that came would have done that.

And so a glance at the manner in which he met these situations reveals the towering, enduring greatness of CLYDE M. REED.

Mr. REED was as courageous as he was intelligent. There was no false bravery in the manner in which he met his enemies. There was no insincerity in his fearlessness. He faced every incident that challenged his courage in the same way. There was real valor in the manner in which he made his decisions.

He never was frightened into doing what he did not believe was right. He never changed a public act because of the possibility of a defeat that others would have called humiliating. He assumed that there was no such thing as a humiliating defeat in a just cause. Certain that some action would alienate supporters, nevertheless he proceeded to follow the precise dictations of his own mind. Threatened by those who demanded support for some cause he believed wrong, CLYDE REED never hesitated in his denunciation of those who made the threats. There was never any compromising on principles. Kansans long ago learned that they could not negotiate a compromise with him. He never yielded a particle to achieve peace for himself. His was the courage of a man who had faith in his own judgment. CLYDE REED fought many a battle that he could have evaded. On occasion after occasion he could have avoided fighting without seeming to have lost anything worth while. Thus he gave the impression of inviting conflict. In politics there is a tendency, unfortunately it might be called a predominating tendency, to carry on by strategy and, through concessions, to avoid frontal clashes. CLYDE REED had no sympathy for this political practice. As a result many believed him belligerent because he was aggressively steadfast. He was called contentious because he would not yield to avoid conflict. No prospect of influencing voters of a certain group by doing something for which he had no heart, because he did not believe it right, interested him. Gifted with a shrewdness everywhere acknowledged for these many years and skilled in appraising that which we call public thinking, CLYDE REED could have steered his own course into quiet waters. That he never did so is the highest tribute to the depth of his sincerity upon which was founded his intrepid courage.

Linked to this gorgeous crowning virtue was the independence which Mr. REED possessed and used constantly. He was entirely free of any influence, save that quality of zealous devotion to duty. He was his own man in public office—as he was outside of public office. He would listen to others but the decisions that were made were his decisions. His utterances were his own utterances. The course he pursued was his own course. This principle of independence he took with him into the governorship and into the United States Senate. It was one of the basic virtues of his character.

Wherever he was, CLYDE REED persisted in maintaining his freedom of thinking and his freedom of action. He avoided every semblance of an alliance that would embarrass him in the exercise of his liberty. This policy of independence did not have the approval of many who would have been glad to support him. But on the other hand it appealed to great sections of people. It won for him the admiration of unnumbered Kansans who recognized his honesty and sincerity and his determination to follow his own judgment. CLYDE REED may have been impatient with those who found fault with the freedom he maintained for himself. But he conceded their right to criticize him. He was willing to pay the costs if costs there were to be. And this course gave him complete satisfaction. He could have this satisfaction because his personal fortunes in politics were largely a matter of indifference to him. He had no selfish interest in office. Whether he obtained official station or remained in one was something he considered comparatively unimportant. But what he did when he had authority was of the utmost importance. It was how he used his powers that counted. This attitude toward public service and his own personal fortunes gave him that self-reliance and assurance which always predominated in his official conduct.

Senator REED was a hard worker. He bent to every job he undertook with a relentless energy and a boundless enthusiasm. He never spared himself. He had little time for play in his lifetime. He turned out an amazing amount of work on his public assignments. Long ago he became deeply interested in one of the major puzzling problems of the Nation, that of transportation. No subject has bothered the brains of administrators and legislators on the domestic scene more than the subject of transportation costs. The progress of the Nation has been involved. Confusion and complexity have characterized the matter of rates. But the questions presented were a challenge to CLYDE REED. He drilled deeply for complete information. He studied with an earnestness that was matched by his tremendous capacity for tabulation and analysis. And from his labors came to him recognition as one of the Nation's foremost authorities on transportation rates. The knowledge he obtained and the information he had always ready made him an outstanding legislator on the subject of interstate commerce with respect to transportation and transportation rates. All of this involved work that took days and nights and held his close attention.

In all other phases of Senator REED'S career in public life he displayed through all the years a stern devotion to hard work. He would not have been happy had he not been busy. When he played it was under orders. When he relaxed, it was against his own wishes. His tireless industry contributed vitally toward making CLYDE REED an invaluable servant, both to his own State and to the Nation.

CLYDE REED'S integrity was never questioned. It was revealed in his courage and independence. He had supreme contempt for dishonesty whether in private life or in public service. Once convinced of a display of dishonesty or fraud, he blasted with his full power. He was not a seeker after wealth. Obtaining money was not his ambition. He was not interested in riches for himself. Certainly in his political life he was not concerned about emoluments. Most of the dishonesty in public place involves obtaining public money or in obtaining legislation favorable to individuals or to groups of individuals who would profit thereby. This was a form of dishonesty which CLYDE REED despised. He was merciless in dealing with it. He believed that the private individual was bad unless he had integrity. He believed that the public man was bad unless he had integrity. Simple honesty was a fundamental thing with him.

High on CLYDE REED's list of attributes of priceless worth was veracity. Those who dealt recklessly with the truth, as well as those who premeditatedly misrepresented were enrolled in his book as persons to be discarded. He wanted no dealings with those who could not or would not tell the truth. Through his years in politics he was continuously confronted by men who were not devoted to veracity. Here again his wonderful mentality served him well. He had the unusual faculty of determining whether he was hearing the truth. No contemporary of his in Kansas politics came near him in avoiding the disasters which always follow the exercising of unrestrained credulity. The long record of his contacts would show an astonishingly small number of those who misled CLYDE REED. Political foes without number will testify that he was a public man who told the truth, who had the courage to do so and who demanded that others show him the same respect. He had an undying hatred for sham and hypocrisy, falsehood's affiliated evils. His treatment of falsifiers and hypocrites was ruthless. He punished them to the fullest extent of his ability.

CLYDE REED spoke and wrote with complete candor. Many of those who called on him took his frankness in expression for bluntness. He possessed the faculty of simple but forceful utterance. When he had spoken or written, there could be no doubt as to what he meant. He found no delight in playing with language. Although he loved good literature, he was not one who employed or cared to employ artistry in words. The simple parlance of the people among whom he had lived and who had honored him was the language of CLYDE REED. His rugged personality was reflected unerringly in what he said. He was not one who resorted to finesse, either in conversation or in public speech. He never sought to be diplomatic. He drove straight to the point and was prepared to take the consequences.

When he had spoken, without any attempt to charm his listeners with eloquence, his meaning was clear. He did not want to be misunderstood. He was not misunderstood. Here again came in those other vital elements which governed his daily life. He demonstrated courage and independence as he expressed himself. The results of his hard work were apparent in his correspondence and in his public and conversational talking. His integrity and his veracity were necessary parts of his candor.

On this point of frankness, of unreserved comment, CLYDE REED commanded respect because he always knew his own mind and was never afraid to speak it. For 30 years no one had authority to speak for CLYDE REED. He spoke for himself.

We are thinking of CLYDE REED today as we take leave of him as a great public servant, a towering figure in Kansas public life and affairs. But there was another side to his life connecting him with the public. He was a newspaper man. He believed that his newspaper was a public institution. He believed that it also should do its full duty as a newspaper, that it should have integrity, that it should be truthful, and that it should be candid. With that resolute determination which governed his conduct in public life, CLYDE REED proposed and supported a newspaper policy based on these fundamental objectives of a free press. He interpreted his obligation as a newspaper man to be that of faithful, honest, and truthful service to the public. If the public had placed its confidence in his newspaper, CLYDE REED believed, the public was entitled to receive honest service. He realized that the newspaper which has these virtues necessarily must expect to suffer whatever punishment may be visited upon it by those who oppose these principles.

Kansas, which adopted CLYDE REED when he was a boy of 4, reared him through adversity and built self-reliance, determination, integrity, and sincerity into his character, bids farewell to this loyal son today. Kansas, which recognized his gifts of mind and heart and installed him in its most exalted posts and gained heavily from his virtues and talents and his devotion to his people for more than a third of his long life, must take leave of him. The sense of loss which Kansas feels today is offset by the pride it has in the career that is closed and the solemn realization of the magnitude of his public service.

CLYDE M. REED is absent—absent on leave. CLYDE M. REED, the most romantic political leader of his generation in Kansas, the most colorful warrior in the battles of the ballots by means of which democracy chooses its spokesmen and defines its course, the statesman of profound mind, restless energy, and rugged honesty, the man unafraid.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL].

The resolution (S. Res. 192) was unanimously agreed to.

RESIGNATION OF SENATOR BALDWIN

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letter, which was read:

UNITED STATES SENATE,

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that pursuant to the power vested in me by the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the State of Connecticut, I, Chester Bowles, the Governor of said State, do hereby appoint WILLIAM BENTON, a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States until the vacancy therein, caused by the resignation of Raymond E. Baldwin, is filled by election, as provided by law.

Witness: His Excellency our Governor Chester Bowles, and our seal hereto affixed at Hartford, this 17th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1949.

CHESTER BOWLES,
Governor.

[SEAL] WINIFRED MCDONALD,
Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The certificate will be placed on file with the Secretary of the Senate.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATH

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the new Senators will come forward, the oath of office will be administered to them.

Mr. LEHMAN, Mr. DARBY, and Mr. BENTON, escorted, respectively, by Mr. IVES, Mr. SCHOEPPEL, and Mr. MCMAHON, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and the oath prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. LUCAS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 193), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled and that the Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. LUCAS and Mr. WHERRY the committee on the part of the Senate.

NOTIFICATION TO THE HOUSE

Mr. WHERRY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 194), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING

Mr. MYERS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 195), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the hour of daily meeting of the Senate be 12 o'clock meridian, unless otherwise ordered.

WILLIAM H. KING

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I am sensible of the custom of the Senate not to prolong the meeting of the first day of a session, and to adjourn out of respect for a Member who has died. But I deem it not out of place at this time to say a few words out of respect for one of our former colleagues who also has left this earth.

My former colleague, the Honorable William H. King, who for so long was a senior Senator from my State, has passed away since the Senate last met. Senator King lived a long time, and all of it most fully. Most of his life was given to service in behalf of his people, his State, and his Nation. That he served well, his record proves. That he was honored in that service, his life also proves.

Senator King can be regarded as Utah's favorite son. His early life reflected well the ideals of his people in developing trained citizens. He was a missionary, a student traveler in Europe, and a graduate of the University of Michigan Law School, before he started his life's work. His public career started when he was a very young man, and I can remind my colleagues of that fact when I state that he was appointed a Territorial supreme court judge in Utah by President Grover Cleveland. Service as a Territorial judge, as a State supreme court judge, as a Representative, and as a Senator for four full terms, is a record which few citizens of our country have equaled. I would emphasize, however, not the mere length of service, but the sincere, honest, painstaking service he rendered. He was a stickler for what he deemed right, to the extent that at times some lost patience with him. He always prided himself as being what we Americans describe as a State's rights man, but his record shows that in his actions he was thinking of America and the world. The value of his foresight in regard to the vital importance of America's interests in Greece, Persia, and the Near East has been proved by what has taken place since. Senator King had a grasp of world affairs and an understanding of the worth of our great Federal system and a sincere belief in the purposefulness of the establishment of our Nation and its destiny. He served his country under nine different Presidents. His devotion to the District of Columbia will long remain a monument to his leadership. What he did for the District will long continue to be a great blessing for the people who live here.

Senator William H. King was an intensely religious man, and his actions were consistent with his beliefs. It was a great privilege to have served with him, and I deem it an honor to be able to utter these few words in tribute to his memory.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, before the Senate adjourns, I desire to make a brief announcement as to the business of the Senate tomorrow. The President of the United States will deliver his message on the state of the Union before a joint session of the Senate and House of Representatives. The Senate will meet here and, as we always do, will march in a body to the Hall of the House of Representatives. After the President concludes his message, Senators will return to the Senate Chamber.

We shall then proceed to the consideration of a measure which is now on the calendar, known as Order No. 288, a bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes. I thought I should make this announcement, because I am certain that nearly all Senators are very much interested in that bill. It will be the order of business tomorrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL], when the Senate concludes its business today, it will adjourn out of respect to the late Senator from Kansas, Mr. REED.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska for a question.

Mr. WHERRY. I ask the distinguished majority leader whether it is intended to continue the sessions of the Senate this week, after the bill is taken up tomorrow?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Nebraska is correct. We shall proceed to discuss and debate the oleomargarine bill through Friday. When we conclude the business of the day on Friday, we shall then take an adjournment until Monday.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I should like to congratulate the majority leader on the wisdom of his choice of a program.

Mr. LUCAS. I felt sure the Senator from Arkansas would agree to that program.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE

On his own request, and by unanimous consent, Mr. MILLIKIN was excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate from next Friday for a week or 10 days thereafter.

On his own request, and by unanimous consent, Mr. FLANDERS, because of official business, was excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate for the remainder of this week.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in accordance with the terms of Senate Resolution 192, agreed to earlier today, and as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late Senator REED, of Kansas, I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, January 4, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JANUARY 3, 1950

This being the day fixed by the twentieth amendment to the Constitution for the meeting of the Congress, the Members of the House of Representatives met in their Hall for the second session of the Eighty-first Congress, and at 12 o'clock noon were called to order by the Speaker, Hon. SAM RAYBURN, a Representative from the State of Texas.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following

PRAYER

Our Heavenly Father, as we stand in the foreglow of a new year, be pleased to hear our humble prayer. Touch Thou the sacred silences of our souls, and make us to feel that what we do today will shape our national life and action of tomorrow. Thou hast set before us an open door and no man can shut it.

We pray for Thy richest blessings to rest upon our beloved country, upon its Representatives in Congress, and upon him who presides over its deliberations. Enable us always to subject ourselves to the blessed influences of Thy spirit, free from discord and intolerance. May there be essential unity of high purpose throughout our land, and the blessing of peace in all the earth.

Let us now all unite in praying the Lord's Prayer:

Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory for ever and ever.

Amen.

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 9, 1949.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker, House of Representatives, United States.

SIR: I beg leave to inform you that I have this day transmitted to the Governor of New Jersey my resignation as a Representative in the Congress of the United States from the Seventh District of New Jersey, such resignation to take effect on the 2d day of January 1950.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO GREECE AND TURKEY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed, with illustrations:

To the Congress of the United States:

Transmitted herewith is the eighth quarterly report on United States military assistance to Greece and Turkey. This report covers the period from April 1, 1949, to June 30, 1949. Military assistance to Greece and Turkey was inaugurated under the authority of Public Law 75, Eightieth Congress, and was continued under the authority of title III of Public Law 472, Eightieth Congress, known as the Greek-Turkish Assistance Act of 1948. Responsibility for United States assistance in the economic rehabilitation of Greece begun under Public Law 75 was transferred to the Economic Cooperation Administration on July 1, 1948, pursuant to Public Law 472, title I.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, November 28, 1949.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TO NOTIFY THE PRESIDENT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, your committee on the part of the House to join a like committee on the part of the Senate to notify the President of the United States that a quorum of each House has been assembled and is ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make has performed that duty. The President asked us to report that he will be pleased to deliver his message at 1 o'clock p. m. January 4, 1950, to a joint session of the two Houses.

PROVIDING FOR JOINT SESSION TOMORROW

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Con. Res. 150) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, January 4, 1950, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday of this week be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

TAX REFORMS

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today a tax bill to provide for increased production and employment through a reduction in some of our war taxes.

The key to general tax reduction lies, of course, in the budget, which will shortly be presented by the President. Unfortunately, however, all the indications are that the President's budget will be in excess of $42,000,000,000 and that another deficit of approximately $5,000,000,000 will be piled on by the end of fiscal 1951. Under such fiscal mismanagement the people of this country can look forward to only higher taxes or an eventual 10-cent dollar. As everyone knows, higher taxes would be disastrous at this time when already at least 30 percent of our national income is being siphoned off to run the Government and pay for the cold war. Just as unthinkable is the continuation of the administration's ruinous course of deficit financing in these prosperous times. I am convinced that an analysis of the President's forthcoming budget will show that it can be reduced by at least five or six billion dollars without the impairment of a single program necessary for either the effective operation of our Government at home or the fulfillment of our obligations abroad.

Not only is a substantial reduction of Government expenditures imperative for the survival of our liberties and the preservation of our free-enterprise system, but immediate attention must also be given to the correction of certain of our tax laws which are already hampering a sound expansion of our economy and if left unchanged will shortly be a major factor in the curtailment of our present high productivity and employment. By timely, wise, and far-sighted tax policies the Government can give encouragement to the full resourcefulness, initiative, and incentive of its citizens. Under such policies this Nation can go forward to unrealized progress and expansion. My bill is designed to aid in achieving this goal by the elimination and modification of our tax laws which are causing the bottlenecks in our economy.

As a result of the bold action taken by Canada in providing similar tax relief, the Canadian economy is continuing to function at a high level and its incipient recession has been averted. Although there was some doubt in Canada as to the economic wisdom of tax relief, subsequent events there have shown the merit of such a course. Not only are tax revenues now exceeding expenditures by even greater amounts than had been predicted, but unemployment has been cut in half.

The following is a summary of the provisions contained in my bill, together with a short analysis of the reason for each proposed amendment:

TITLE I. INCOME TAX—PART I. INDIVIDUALS

Increase in per capita exemption: My bill raises the personal exemption of all individual taxpayers, including fiduciaries, from $600 to $700 and increases the amount of the credit for dependents from $600 to $700.

Although I believe that every economic group should bear its fair share of the tremendous cost to Government, the gradual shrinkage of the purchasing power of the dollar, together with the increased burden of Federal, State, and local excise and sales taxes, has imposed an undue burden on our low-income families. In fact, the truth of the matter is that many hard-working and conscientious American citizens are actually being deprived of the very necessities of life as the result of the excessive tax burden. Such excessive taxation is not only a barrier to responsible citizenship, but operates as a major obstacle in the path of a higher standard of living for all our people. Particularly is this so for our approximately 10,000,000 families with incomes below $2,000 a year on whom the burden of our hidden taxes falls most heavily. It is imperative, therefore, that we provide immediate tax relief to our low-income groups. In Canada, where government economy has been translated from words into reality, the basic exemptions have already been raised since the war to $1,000 for a single person and $2,000 for a married couple. Only back in 1939, our exemptions were $1,000 for a single person and $2,500 for married taxpayers. I hope that eventually our fiscal picture will permit us to return to our prewar level of exemptions. My bill is a forward step in that direction.

Surtax reduction: Just as vital to the continuation of our national well-being as mitigating the excessive tax burden on our lower income groups is the provision in my bill which imposes a 50-percent tax limitation. In my opinion, and in the opinion of many distinguished Americans of both political parties, every taxpayer should have at least an even break with the tax collector so that no more than one-half of the financial rewards of his efforts are taken from him during his life. The high rate of the Federal estate tax, together with State inheritance and estate taxes, make the passage of substantial fortunes from one generation to the next now impossible. Moreover, and aside from any considerations of equity and fairness and the just relationship of the Government to its citizens, there is the real and practical consideration that a 50-percent tax limitation will unquestionably result in increased revenue for the Government within a year's time. Past experience bears this out. You will recall that in 1921, when we had a top surtax rate of 65 percent, the tax yield from the approximately 330 individuals in this group was just a little over $88,000,000. In 1924, when the top rate was only 40 percent on similar incomes, the number of taxpayers in this category had more than doubled and the revenues collected from them was over $135,000,000. In 1928, when the rate was down to 20 percent, the number of high income taxpayers was over 3,000 and their share of the tax load was $414,814,319. In 1921 the number of people with incomes in the highest bracket paid only 12 percent of the total of individual income taxes, but by 1929 the tax collections from this group had risen to 39 percent of the total individual income-tax burden. A similar and just as striking example of how rate reduction can actually increase revenues by energizing and stimulating the national economy is shown by the effect of the reduced tax rates between 1921 and 1929 on individuals having annual net incomes of $25,000 and over:

Annual income-tax liabilities of individuals reporting net incomes of $25,000 a year and over in tax returns filed with U. S. Treasury [1]

Year:
1922	$572,000,000
1923	423,000,000
1924	550,000,000
1925	627,000,000
1926	626,000,000
1927	724,000,000
1928	1,045,000,000
1929	928,000,000

[1] Statistics of Income, pt. I, Historical Summaries, 1938 (U. S. Bureau of Internal Revenue).

Relief to shareholder from double tax on dividends: In order to sustain full employment, which together with high productivity is essential for a stable economy and continued prosperity, some 750,000 jobs must be created each year for younger workers entering the labor force. This means new industries, new plants, tools, and new equipment must be provided. This in turn depends on a steady flow of equity capital into industry. But the facts are that the once steady stream of venture capital has dried to an almost imperceptible trickle as the result of unfavorable tax policies. Postwar expansion has accordingly been financed largely by retained profits and bank and insurance company loans. Undoubtedly relief from the double taxation of corporate dividends is a further and most necessary tax revision to encourage needed capital formation and to revive the flow of venture capital. As an initial step in this direction my bill provides that every taxpayer, other than a corporation, shall be entitled to a deduction from his gross income of the amount of dividends received up to an aggregate maximum amount of $500. I am frank to admit that this provision is not a complete solution to the problem, but pending a time when the fiscal situation of the Government permits the double taxation of dividends to be eliminated entirely, this provision is a recognition at least of the inequity of this tax and the beginning of a solution to the problem.

Canada has again taken the lead in this field, and I call your attention to the statement made by the Canadian Minister of Finance, Douglas Abbot, when he told the Canadian Parliament last March:

> Today we find governments in this country, as well as in most other countries, taxing away at least a third of corporate profits. In addition, the personal income-tax rates apply in full to what is distributed out of the remaining two-thirds. The tax may be as high as 80 percent upon distributions to shareholders. It seems to me that under a system of private enterprise which depends for its existence on a steady flow of venture capital, we cannot afford to neglect the implication of this defect in our tax system, which has been accentuated by the increase in both corporate and personal income-tax rates. * * * It is a matter of concern for the future under a system where we depend, and must depend, for full employment and the creation of new wealth on the willingness of our people to risk their money in constructive enterprises.

Reduction of tax on capital gains: Another tax revision which is sorely needed to energize the flow of equity capital needed for an expanding economy and full employment is a modification of the present tax treatment of capital gains. Accordingly, my bill amends the present law by providing that only 40 percent instead of 50 percent of a long-term capital gain will be subjected to taxation and reduce the maximum tax rate on this portion from 50 percent to 40 percent. This modification is designed particularly to alleviate the burden of the capital-gains tax on all taxpayers both large and small. This is achieved by reducing from 50 percent to 40 percent the amount of the gain subjected to the tax. By reducing the rate from 50 percent to 40 percent, the maximum tax to be imposed will be only 16 percent instead of 25 percent, as under present law. Not only will the easing of the burden of the capital-gains tax encourage new venture capital but it will undoubtedly result in increased revenue to the Government. This is so because at this present time of inflated money when there may be gain as measured in money but no increment in value, many persons are prevented from selling or disposing of property because of the present capital-gains tax. For example, most persons find that their houses which they purchased some years ago have increased in value. If, however, they sell their houses, they have to pay a capital-gains tax on the profit but the cost to them of a new house will generally be as high or higher than the price received for the house they sold. In other words, they are forced to pay a tax on phantom profits. I have carefully weighed the many other proposals suggested for alleviating the inequity and deterrent effect of the present capital-gains tax but believe the provisions in my bill which will benefit the lower- and middle-income groups primarily are the most equitable and will serve as the soundest foundation for subsequent modifications.

Election as to taxation of unincorporated business as a corporation: Under present law any business enterprise operated by an individual or by a partnership is compelled to pay the full normal and surtax on any earnings left in the business. As a result many small businesses are unable to accumulate earnings for expansion and increased production. My bill contains a provision which will permit unincorporated businesses to be taxed like corporations. It provides that any business enterprise operated by an individual or a partnership consisting of not more than 20 individuals, other than a nonresident alien or a foreign partnership, may be treated, for tax purposes, as if such business enterprise were a corporation subject to certain conditions and limitations. In the cases of a partnership each partner must concur in the election. If the owner or owners of the business so elect to be treated as if they were doing business in the corporate form, then the amounts received by them from the business enterprise will be regarded as corporate dividends. By treating such business enterprises as a corporation, many small business enterprises will be permitted to accumulate the necessary earnings for expansion and increased production. If, however, the earnings are accumulated beyond the reasonable needs of business enterprise, then the provisions of section 102 relating to unreasonable accumulation of earnings, for the purpose of avoiding individual surtaxes will be applicable. My bill contains certain amendments to section 102, discussed later in this statement, which, if enacted, will make section 102 operate more equitably, and will prevent any misinterpretation of it from defeating the purpose of this provision.

PART II. CORPORATIONS

Repeal of 2-percent penalty tax for filing consolidated returns: My bill eliminates the present 2-percent penalty tax levied against corporations for the privilege of filing consolidated income-tax returns. Inasmuch as consolidated tax returns for corporations are admittedly essential to an accurate statement of the corporate accounts and contribute both to the compliance and accuracy of the income-tax returns, the law should encourage and not discourage by an additional tax the use of consolidated accounts and tax returns. The present 2-percent tax levied against corporations for filing consolidated returns is inequitable and illogical and accordingly my bill removes this tax.

Specific exemption of corporations: My bill provides that a corporation shall be entitled to the same $700 exemption as is provided for individual taxpayers. This provision will be of particular assistance to small corporations. A corporation exists only for the benefit of its stockholders, management, and employees, and a provision which will assist small corporations will give incentive to these groups and assist in expanding the national economy and the national income.

Surtax on corporations improperly accumulating surplus: Much-needed tax revision for the encouragement of new capital and to assist in expanding production facilities is a revision of section 102 of the code. Under this present law, penalties are imposed on corporations which are found to have accumulated reserves in excess of the reasonable needs of their business. The tax imposed is in addition to the regular corporate income tax. The fear of subjecting earnings to this tax has in many instances resulted in the distribution of funds badly needed by businesses for expansion, protection against possible business set-backs, and other valid purposes. Accordingly my bill makes three amendments to the present law which are designed to reduce the pressure on taxpayers to distribute earnings needed for real business purposes and to remove some of the harsher aspects of the present tax treatment under this law. The law is continued as a safeguard against the improper accumulation of surplus. In general the three amendments made by my bill provide that the burden of proof in section 102 cases is shifted from the taxpayer to the Treasury; that corporations in computing income for purposes of this section be allowed to deduct dividends paid within 75 days after the end of the tax year; and that profits from the capital gains now included as income for purposes of section 102 be exempt from the penalty tax if they are long-term gains. In regard to this last point, such gains may be taken into consideration by the Treasury in determining whether other income was accumulated beyond the reasonable needs of the business.

TITLE II. ESTATE TAX

Estate tax payment bonds: As the direct result of the present high Federal estate and inheritance taxes, small businesses are fast becoming a relic of our American economy. Their extinction not only represents a grave threat to our whole competitive system, but is a glaring manifestation of how our tax laws can have an injurious impact on our economy. Unfortunately, too much time has been spent in investigating and prosecuting big business for ruthlessly swallowing its small competitors and not enough time has been devoted to attacking the real problem—that many small businesses are forced to either sell out, merge or face extinction by liquidation upon the death of the owner in order to pay the high estate and inheritance taxes. Accordingly, my bill contains a provision specifically designed to meet this problem. It provides in general that an individual may anticipate and prepare for the estate tax by buying estate tax payment bonds up to an amount not in excess of $200,000. These bonds are tax exempt to the extent of the estate tax computed on the net estate excluding the value of such bonds. Any excess of bonds over the tax will be included in the estate and accordingly subjected to tax. The bonds, which are noninterest bearing, must have been purchased prior to 2 years before the decedent's death and be held by him at the time of death. This provision is necessary in order to prevent the use of these bonds as an escape from the estate tax through contemplation of death transactions, and will give the Government the use of the money, interest free, for a minimum period of 2 years.

As a result of this provision, persons owning small businesses will have an opportunity to prepare for the estate taxes and will therefore not be under the pressure to either sell their businesses before death or to merge with other companies. It seems to me that this approach to the problem will be far more beneficial than the alternate course of imposing greater Government restrictions and controls on the business community.

EXCISE TAXES

The excise tax relief provisions contained in my bill are for the most part identical with the provisions contained in the two bills I introduced early last year and which I urged the Congress to speedily enact at that time. As I pointed out last year, and which point now has finally been grasped by the administration, rates of tax in themselves do not bring in revenues. On the contrary, too high rates may and are at this time actually decreasing revenues from our excise taxes. Apart from this purely fiscal aspect of the problem is the fact that many of the excise taxes imposed during the war are acting as a deterrent to business activity and fuller employment. This, as I have pointed out on many occasions, is perfectly natural because the primary objective of many of these taxes was in discouraging civilian consumption and civilian production which competed with the defense program for men and materials. There is also the most significant factor that the hidden taxes are now bearing more heavily than ever on our lower income groups as the result of increasing State and local sale and excise taxes. Relief from these taxes is long overdue, and I cannot fail to comment on the fact that even those strongest advocates on the "hand-out state" who have blocked the lifting of the excise-tax burden from the backs of the consumers are now attempting to curry political favor by urging the repeal of these taxes. There was ample opportunity to repeal these taxes last year but my efforts, and the efforts of others who have long advocated the removal of many of these taxes, was effectively blocked by the administration.

The proposals for excise-tax relief contained in my bill cover a broad field and are designed not as a permanent solution but as an initial step in the complete removal of these taxes, which can be accomplished by this administration if it were sincere in its desire to encourage the free-enterprise system and not destroy it.

The excise-tax reductions provided for in my bill are as follows:

TITLE III. EXCISE TAXES—PART I. RETAILERS' EXCISE TAXES

Luggage: Elimination of the tax on ladies' handbags, pocketbooks, billfolds, and key cases, and reduction of the retail tax on the remaining articles of luggage from 20 percent to 15 percent.

Jewelry: Elimination of the tax on fountain pen gold points and rhinestone buttons and reduction of the retail tax on jewelry from 20 percent to 15 percent.

Furs: Reduction of the tax from 20 percent to 15 percent.

Toilet preparations: Elimination of the tax on baby oils, lotions, and powders, and reduction of the tax on other toilet articles from 20 percent to 15 percent.

Elimination of the tax on toilet articles sold to barber shops and beauty parlors for the use in operation thereof.

PART II. MANUFACTURERS' EXCISE TAXES

Tires and inner tubes: Under existing law the tax on tires has been construed to apply to tires used on children's toys, ordinary lawn mowers, and bicycles. I do not believe that the Congress ever intended to collect a tax on articles of this type. Accordingly my bill remedies this situation by exemption from the tax on tires, tires manufactured, produced, or imported to retail at not more than $5 each.

Automobiles, and so forth; exemptions:

(a) Trailer coaches. The application of the automobile tax to house trailers discriminates against one type of house as compared with another and places an undue hardship on many of our veterans who, during the housing shortage are purchasing for houses a large number of trailer coaches. My bill corrects this inequity by exempting trailer coaches from the automobile tax.

(b) Rebuilt, and so forth, parts or accessories: In connection with the tax on automotive parts and accessories, the Treasury rulings have been very conflicting with respect to the taxation of rebuilt, reconditioned and repaired parts or accessories. These rebuilt, reconditioned, and repaired parts should not be subjected to the tax which is intended to apply only to new parts. The bill corrects this inequity by exempting from the tax on automotive parts or accessories, rebuilt, reconditioned, or repaired parts.

Musical instruments: Another wartime tax which has been particularly harmful with respect to schools, churches, and juvenile clubs, is the tax on musical instruments. The revenue from this source is not large and musical instruments are used in many cases for educational, religious, and character-building purposes. My bill repeals the tax on musical instruments.

Electric, gas, and oil appliances: Under existing law, if a farmer buys a direct motor-driven fan for use in a barn or poultry house or for the ventilation of potato storage, apple storage, or other types of storage, he is required to pay the 10-percent tax applicable to electrical appliances. On the other hand, if he buys a belt-driven fan for the same purposes, no excise tax is applicable. Electric direct motor-driven fans are not luxury items but are used in industry, on the farm and in commercial establishments for the protection, health, and comfort of workers. My bill corrects this inequity by amending the law to confine the tax to electric direct motor-driven fans of the ceiling, wall-bracket, desk, pedestal, and air-circulator types.

Photographic apparatus: Reduction of the tax to 10 percent.

Lubricating oils: The present law imposes a tax of 6 cents per gallon on lubricating oils. Lubricating oil has been construed by the Treasury and the courts to apply to cutting oils, a much cheaper grade of oil than motor oils and which is not used primarily as a lubricant but to carry away chips and cuttings, and to cool cutting machine tools. My bill removes from the tax on lubricating oils, oils designed primarily for use in cutting and machining operations on metals and known commercially as cutting oils.

Electric light bulbs and tubes: Reduction from 20 percent to 10 percent.

Matches: Elimination of the tax except as to fancy colored matches.

PART III. TRANSPORTATION AND COMMUNICATION

Telegraph, telephone, radio, and cable facilities: Elimination of the war tax rates on long-distance and local telephone service and on wire and equipment service; reduction from 25 percent to 20 percent on domestic telegraph, cable, and radio dispatches, leased wire, and so forth.

Transportation of persons: Reduction of the rate of tax from 15 percent to 10 percent.

Transportation of property: The present tax is at the rate of 3 percent upon the price paid for the transportation of property except in the case of the transportation of coal, where the rate is 4 cents per short ton. This is another tax which is a distinct burden on the farmer, the businessman, and the shipper. My bill cuts the rate from 3 percent to 1½ percent, and in the case of coal from 4 cents per short ton to 2 cents per short ton.

PART IV. MISCELLANEOUS

Admissions: During the war the exemption from the admissions tax to religious, education, or charitable entertainments, county fairs, and concerts conducted by civilian or community member associations was removed. The admissions tax from these sources results in very little revenue and imposes a burdensome administrative duty on these worth while and deserving groups which should be encouraged. My bill restores the exemptions existing before the war to these groups. It also eliminates the admissions war tax rates on general admissions, permanent use or lease of boxes or seats, dues or membership fees, sales of tickets outside the box office, and reduces the cabaret tax from 20 percent to 10 percent.

Safe-deposit boxes: Reduction from the present 20-percent rate to 15 percent on the rental of safe-deposit boxes.

Cigarettes: The present Federal tax on cigarettes is $3.50 per thousand for regular-size cigarettes (those weighing not more than 3 pounds per thousand) and $8.40 per thousand for those cigarettes weighing more than 3 pounds per thousand. A most unfair aspect of the present tax is that the tax applied gives no consideration to the actual price charged for the cigarettes. Economy cigarettes are taxed the same rate per pack as the expensive brands. This is an unfair discrimination against the independent manufacturers, and my bill corrects this discrimination by providing a tax of $2.45 per thousand on cigarettes manufactured or imported to retail at the rate of not more than 12 cents per 20 cigarettes.

Chewing tobacco: The heavy tax of 18 cents per pound now imposed on chewing tobacco is greatly reducing the demand and resulting in injury to the tobacco farmer and the chewing-tobacco manufacturer. My bill reduces the rate from 18 cents to 8 cents per pound.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDaniel, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had adopted the following resolutions:

Senate Resolution 192

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow and deep regret the announcement of the death of Hon. CLYDE M. REED, late a Senator from the State of Kansas.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate, at the conclusion of its business today, do adjourn.

Senate Resolution 193

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled and that the Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

Senate Resolution 194

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

Senate Resolution 195

Resolved, That the hour of daily meeting of the Senate be at 12 o'clock meridian, unless otherwise ordered.

ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. O'BRIEN] is detained on account of official business and cannot be here today or tomorrow. He wishes this fact to appear in the RECORD of today.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KEOGH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances, in one to include extraneous matter.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.

Mr. SADOWSKI asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in five instances, in each to include extraneous matter.

Mr. SULLIVAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. GATHINGS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the Commercial Appeal of Memphis of Sunday, May 29, 1949.

Mr. PHILBIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances, in one to include extraneous matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include therein an editorial from the Buffalo Courier-Express of January 1, together with a dispatch of the same date to the same newspaper, both in connection with the introduction of a bill by the gentleman from New York, Mr. WILLIAM L. PFEIFFER, relating to the naming of a hospital in Buffalo in honor of the late Congressman Andrews.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

REPORT TO CONGRESS FROM THE PEOPLE OF THE NINTH DISTRICT OF ALABAMA

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, the people of the Ninth District of Alabama have a message which I feel Congress and the Nation should hear. For the past 2 months it has been my privilege to report to the people of my district about Congress and national affairs. Now I am taking the opportunity to give this report to Congress from the people of my district.

Today marks the start of one of history's most crucial sessions of the United States Congress. The world is tense. Our way of life is challenged. Deep and far-reaching decisions must be made. Therefore this message is important.

During the brief recess of Congress, I made an earnest attempt to talk to as many people in my district as possible—a district composed of approximately 600,000 people in a highly industrialized area. In doing this, I visited over 35 post offices, attended many community gatherings, addressed civic groups, visited schools and PTA meetings, talked with grocers, miners, steel workers, and as many other groups and individuals as I could possibly reach. I asked the people of my district many questions and found that they had given serious thought to our country's problems. Here are the opinions and ideas I have gathered from a cross section of my people back home on a few of the main issues before us.

The citizens of my district are violently opposed to Federal intervention in local policies and customs. They believe in making their own decisions in such matters. They strongly object to the administration's use of executive power to force the so-called civil rights program on us, as in the recent Executive order abolishing segregation in housing programs based on Government loans. The administration is clearly going against the will of Congress when it forces such policies through, after Congress has rejected them. It is my strong belief that our racial problems must be solved at home and not by force from outside. I will continue my determined efforts to protect the rights of the individual and to prevent invasion by the Federal Government in matters which are clearly the right of local people and local government.

The people of the Ninth District of Alabama are deeply concerned over the ever increasing tax burden. They do not believe that taxes should be raised, but that some adjustments should be made. The majority of the people want to abolish the high tax on oleomargarine and the excessive wartime excise tax on so-called luxuries, such as baby oils, telephones, telegrams, and transportation. I believe we have reached the danger point in taxes, where additional tax burden would mean less return for the Government.

The people of the Ninth District want to eliminate the wasteful expenditures of our Federal Government and give essential services in a more proficient manner. Most of those I have talked with are strongly in favor of the purpose of the Hoover Commission recommendations and most of the individual reports. I have actively supported this drive for economy and efficiency in government.

I feel that we can help bring about needed economies and get on a sound financial basis through a one-package appropriation bill. By this I mean we should consider all money bills at the same time and judge them on their individual and relative merit—putting first things first. When we reach the limit of our income we should stop spending until more money comes into the Federal Treasury. We cannot afford to continue overspending beyond our income or we will bankrupt the people's confidence in our Government—which would be disastrous.

The prevention of war and the defense of our country are uppermost in the minds of most of the citizens of the Ninth Alabama District. My district has some of the best and most active Reserve groups in the country. They and the veterans' organizations are vitally interested in seeing the defenses of our country adequately maintained, as are our other citizens. There is plenty of room for economy in government without wrecking our Reserve programs which are so vital to our defense. There have been threats that the very life line of our Reserves will be cut. I feel that it is long-term economy to keep our citizen soldiers well trained, even if our foreign-aid program must be scaled down to do so. Most of our people realize that our foreign-aid program has paid dividends to us in helping to maintain world peace, but now the European countries are in a much better position to help themselves, and we are less able to continue such large scale expenditures. Our people feel that we should now gear our future commitments accordingly. A great many people at home are particularly concerned over our weak policy in the Far East. They believe that our country, the outstanding world power, should take a firmer stand in the Far East, so that we can demand the respect we are entitled to receive out there. We certainly should not allow any further outrageous episodes as have recently occurred in China, where our citizens have been jailed for no cause. Also many of our people cannot understand why the United States has given such feeble support to rebuilding the United Nations since Russia has killed its effectiveness to prevent a major war.

As a veteran, a reservist, and a Congressman, I realize the wisdom of our people at home in wanting to keep the defenses of our country strong, to build a foreign policy based on understanding, respect, and mutual aid and to make the United Nations strong enough to prevent war. It is my purpose to continue working diligently to achieve these goals.

These are of course only a few of the more immediate issues expected to come up early in this second session of Congress. There are many other vital problems which I have discussed with the people at home that may come up later in the year. Time prevents me from going into all of these issues now—but I am going to continue to study these problems and devote my every effort to representing the people of my district fairly, wisely, and with an open mind on all issues.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished majority leader the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] may extend his remarks in four instances, in three of them to include speeches by the President of the United States, and in the other to include an editorial entitled "A Divided Ireland," from the Boston Globe.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

BROOKLYN IS PROUD OF REPRESENTATIVE EDNA F. KELLY

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, Brooklyn is proud indeed of its many "firsts." I feel certain that the induction of Mrs. EDNA F. KELLY today as a Member of this House, representing the Tenth Congressional District of New York, will go down in Brooklyn's history as one of the more important "firsts." She comes here as the first woman elected out of the Borough of Brooklyn, and indeed the first out of the entire city of New York. Her service also marks the first time that the State of New York has had two women in this body serving simultaneously.

She is a charming, intelligent, gentle lady, who brings to her work a vast experience gained from serving her community in all of its worth-while endeavors.

Those of us who knew her late husband, City Court Justice Edward L. Kelly, and his late father, William E. Kelly, who served for many years as president of the National Association of Letters Carriers, as postmaster of Brooklyn, and as county clerk of Kings County, see reflected in her their talents for devotion to the ideal that one gets most out of life by giving his all in service to mankind.

Welcome, Representative KELLY. Congratulations and best wishes. May your stay with us be long, pleasant, and fruitful.

AUTOMOBILES FOR CERTAIN DISABLED VETERANS

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and include a bill which I have introduced.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I rise to wish you and all Members of the House a very happy and a very successful new year. Certainly this will be one of the most important years in the history of our country.

Mr. Speaker, I have reintroduced a bill to provide automobiles for certain disabled veterans. A similar bill was vetoed by President Truman last summer. In my opinion, the President misunderstood the provisions of the bill. He received very bad advice on it. It was a very cruel veto, and if he could have an opportunity to reconsider the bill I believe he would not veto it.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KILBURN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from a country newspaper in northern New York.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter to a constituent.

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a poem.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S WELFARE STATE

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have it on my mind to say and to prophesy today that the extent to which the present Congress shall refuse to be blindly led in adopting the proposed presentations and programs of the President for the continuation under the Fair Deal of a welfare state will mark the beginning or the end of an era.

God save the United States of America.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BROWN of Ohio asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement by John Tope, chairman of the Young Republican National Federation, on the state of the Union for young men and women.

Mr. NORBLAD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. GROSS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper editorial.

Mr. JUDD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances, in each to include extraneous material.

POSSIBLE RECOGNITION OF THE COMMUNIST REGIME IN CHINA BY GREAT BRITAIN OR OTHER COUNTRIES

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, if, as is being predicted, Great Britain gives official recognition and thereby enormous assistance to the Communist puppet regime in China, an avowed enemy of the west and a partner of the Kremlin, it will be very difficult for the Congress to support aid programs for Britain in the future as in the past. I say this as one who has supported since 1938 every proposal for aid to Britain because I believed that to be in our own country's interest.

But now either we are in a cold war against a common enemy, world communism, or we are not. If we are, then what excuse can there be for England or any other country aiding and abetting that common enemy?

If we are not in a cold war, then what adequate reason is there for continuing the taxation of the overburdened American people to aid Britain?

How can we justify helping any nation against the common enemy if that nation helps the common enemy against us?

COTTON LEGISLATION

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, when the cotton-allotment legislation was written last year it was an agreed-on bill. I believe the RECORD will bear out this statement.

I quote from page 10712 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 3, 1949. The remarks are those of the distinguished chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, Representative COOLEY:

> Now we bring before the committee a bill that was unanimously reported by the subcommittee and unanimously approved by the full committee, a bill that is highly technical and difficult to understand.
> This bill makes rather liberal provisions for both little growers and new growers, and I hope that none of the provisions will be disturbed.

None of the provisions was disturbed.

However, it is being shown from day to day that the legislation is threatening to injure badly and perhaps to disrupt the economy of a number of counties throughout the Cotton Belt. Certainly it is a very serious situation. Between 1942 and now, it will be remembered, a great world war was fought. There were many dislocations during this period of time. I have one county, for example, that had 74,000 acres of cotton allotted in 1942. It has a little over 16,000 acres now, or one-fifth. There are counties in Texas, on the other hand, that have nearly twice as much allotted cotton acreage in 1950 as were allotted to the same counties in 1942.

There has been a great deal said about a 5-acre minimum provision in the bill as passed. I quote this discussion that took place August 3 between the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] and me. It appears on page 10723 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask some of the Members who are sponsoring this bill this question. It is in the form of an assumption, but I think a very real assumption.

Assume that a veteran 25 or 26 years of age never did anything except grow cotton on a cotton farm until 1942, when he went into the Army; assume he remained in the Army until 1946; assume that he took GI training to be a mechanic for 2 years and while doing so he did not farm; assume that he owns a 60-acre cotton farm which has had no cotton on it since 1942; assume that today he loses his job and goes back to that cotton farm which has not had cotton grown on it since 1942. The question is: Will he be privileged to get 5 acres of cotton?

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECKWORTH. I yield.

Mr. PACE. That depends, and I have tried to explain it to the gentleman, that depends entirely upon the State PMA Committee of the State of Texas, and the county PMA Committee in which that farm is located. He can, and will very likely get considerably more than 5 acres. It depends upon the amount of acreage the State committee allocates to that county for new farms. If the State committee gives the county, for example, 500 acres for new farms every acre of it must go to new farms. Then in addition to that 500 acres, the county committee may reserve 10 percent that can be used for new farms. So the allotment could be identical with like farms in the same area.

Mr. BECKWORTH. May I ask this further question: however, is it true or is it not true that the definite 5-acre minimum applies to him?

Mr. PACE. It does not.

My amendment, introduced on page 10728 of the August 3 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to give genuine cotton farmers a 5-acre minimum was defeated. I include at this point some proceedings from the RECORD about the amendment:

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Amendment offered by Mr. BECKWORTH: Page 16, line 3, after the period, insert the following subsection:

"'(f) The penalty provided for in this section shall not apply with respect to cotton produced by any person who is recognized by the county committee as being a cotton farmer if his total acreage does not exceed 5 acres.'"

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, this makes it definite that if the county committee recognizes a person as being a cotton farmer that person shall have 5 acres of cotton. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SUTTON] spoke about 16,000,000 veterans. If he will read my amendment he will find that I said "if they are recognized by the county committee as being cotton farmers." Those from New York, for instance, could not be recognized by the county committee as being cotton farmers.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] spoke about 6,000,000 bales. On July 25 the Department of Agriculture wrote me a letter as to the number of farmers growing 5 bales or less on the average, and there were 601,273. If every one of them grew 4 bales of cotton that would be 2,405,092 bales, and not 6,000,000. I would appreciate it if in the gentleman's remarks he would show where he got this 6,000,000 figure. It would be interesting indeed when we consider the fact that I have here a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, written on July 5, with the particular figures I have given.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECKWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. How could the gentleman determine and how could the county committee determine whether a man is a cotton farmer?

Mr. BECKWORTH. How did the 6,000,000 bales come in?

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman does not provide any way of determining whether a man grows cotton or not.

Mr. BECKWORTH. The county committee would know. I repeat, they are knowing men, and would, to the extent they have authority under the law, be fair and just in their decisions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BECKWORTH) there were—ayes 12, noes 56.

So the amendment was rejected.

The cotton acreage bill was changed again October 19. I quote my remarks about the amendment. They appeared on pages 15075 and 15076 of the October 19 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Thank you, Mr. MURRAY, for yielding to me. This is, indeed, considerate of you.

It was my contention as the debate on the cotton quota legislation August 3, 1949, proceeded that not enough consideration was given to the small family-sized farmer such as the veteran who had been away or the small family-sized farmer who had worked in a defense plant or the successor of the defense plant. I refer, of course, to a genuine farmer found so to be by the county agricultural committee of the respective county. Many of these farmers, genuine farmers they are, are at home now. They deserve a fair deal as to peanuts and cotton and other crop quotas. This fair deal they must have. I offered several amendments August 3. They were opposed. I quote some of the statements made about changing the cotton quota bill then.

I quote Representative PACE, one who has worked on the cotton quota bill diligently. His remarks are on page 10711:

"Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, the sentiments expressed here by the distinguished gentleman from Texas have motivated his entire service in the Congress. That is, his interest in the family-sized small farm. It gives me pleasure to tell him that there has never been a bill, such as that now before the House, which concerns itself so much with the welfare of the family-size farm.

"I may also say there has never been a bill presented to the House that is as liberal in authorizing allowances for new farms and small farms."

I quote again Representative PACE. His remarks appear on page 10714 of the same CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 3, 1949:

"I said a while ago to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH] that there never has been a bill brought to the Congress giving more consideration to the small operator than does this bill. We have gone just as far as we can go, because every man who has been growing cotton, big or little, has some rights that must be protected."

Now I quote the distinguished chairman of the House Agriculture Committee; his remarks appear on page 10712.

"To talk about the little grower and about protecting and providing for the little fellow, to talk about the new grower, as the matter has been discussed here, seems to me to indicate a lack of understanding of the measure that has been presented.

"This bill makes rather liberal provision for both little growers and new growers."

Already the cotton-quota bill is being amended—less than 3 months after the passage of the 1949 cotton-quota bill. I am not surprised. My remarks of August 3 establish clearly that I would not be surprised. To give the small family-size cotton farmer a fair deal, it should be amended some more—at least to the extent he can earn a living. I refer only to genuine cotton farmers, cotton farmers found so to be by their county agricultural committees. Be it recalled, I emphasized this when I spoke several times August 3, 1949. My amendments of that date disclose this as my meaning.

Yes; the 1949 cotton-quota bill is being amended today.

The amendment was offered originally in the Senate by Senator ANDERSON. It is on page 14324, in the middle of the first column, of the October 12, 1949, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Here is the amendment—it was not explained:

"Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I have an amendment, which is on the desk and which I ask to have stated.

"The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

"The amendment was, on page 23, after line 4, to insert the following:

"'SEC. —. Section 344 (f) (3) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended by Public Law 272, Eighty-first Congress, is amended (i) by striking the figure "10" in the first sentence and inserting therefor the figure "15", and (ii) by striking the figure "30" in the proviso and inserting therefor the figure "20".'"

I have not heard it explained today; it is found on the last page of the conference report we have before us today. The report is not numbered, but accompanies H. R. 5345.

I sought an explanation and include the explanation at this point:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., October 17, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is with reference to your letter of October 13, 1949, relating to an amendment being submitted pertaining to subsection (f) (3) of section 344 of Public Law 272, Eighty-first Congress.

This amendment proposed to increase the reserve which county committees may withhold for specified use and adjustments from 10 to 15 percent and changing the percentage of any such reserve withheld for use in adjusting allotments otherwise computed between 5 and 15 acres from 30 to 20 percent.

The Department, in its work this year with the Congress pertaining to the cotton-acreage allotment and marketing-quota legislation, has consistently recommended greater flexibility in the allotment procedures by providing adequate reserves for the State and county production and marketing administration committees to use in making specified adjustments which mathematical formulas so often fail to recognize.

This amendment does provide additional flexibility to the county committee by making it possible for them to have more acreage to adjust allotments below 5 acres and above 15 acres and does not alter the acreage that they would have for adjustments for allotments between 5 and 15 acres. Also, such amendment, by increasing the reserve from which new farm allotments may be made, would, if the committees so provided, make more acreage available for this use. The Department, therefore, feels that such an amendment is desirable.

Sincerely yours,

K. T. HUTCHINSON,
Acting Secretary.

I am glad to note that among others to benefit under the terms of the amendment are those farmers who grow 5 bales or less.

Again I assert for peanut quotas to endure, for cotton quotas to endure, they both must be fair to the family-size peanut or cotton farmer. In this direction we must move forward. All types of farmers must receive their fair share of the agricultural income.

I quote a letter I recently received from a constituent of mine:

MINEOLA, TEX.

Hon. Mr. BECKWORTH.

DEAR SIR: See, I am a renter and I want to know how much cotton I will be allowed to plant next year before I start farming cotton. I am enclosing a letter from the Quitman AAA office.

Will say under the new law you fellows have made instead of putting more fellows on the farm you all are fixing laws to put them off the farm. Me and my son have now about $900 worth of peanuts we can't sell because there wasn't any allotment on these farms, and there are thousands of farms that don't have allotments, so you can see cotton will be on the same order the farms have been laying out during the war and can't get allotments in Wood County.

So let me know how much cotton I will be allowed. If I am cut very bad I will be forced off the farm. I am 60 years old, and farming is all I know and can do, but when you fellows make laws to stop me and others from farming it is too bad. So let me hear from you at once.

I could write a book of how the farmers are being pressed off the farm, and you can see, can't you?

Yours respectfully.

At this point, I desire to include some figures that pertain to cotton acreage, county by county, in Texas:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
College Station, Tex., December 5, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Congress of the United States,
Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: As requested in your letter of December 2, I am attaching a list of 1950 county cotton allotments on which the 1942 county cotton allotments are also shown. We have not entered the 1941 and 1940 county cotton allotments since there is very little difference, county by county, in these and the 1942 allotments.

It should be remembered in making comparisons that the 1942 State allotment was slightly more than 2,000,000 acres larger than the 1950 State allotment.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

[Enclosure.]

DECEMBER 2, 1949.

1950 COUNTY COTTON ALLOTMENTS

The 1950 cotton acreage allotments for Texas counties were announced today by B. F. Vance, chairman of the State PMA committee. These allotments with the 1947 and 1948 county planted acreages are listed below. County allotments were computed on the basis of the 1947–48 average acreage with adjustments being made for trends and abnormal conditions affecting cotton plantings.

The 1950 State cotton allotment is 7,637,029 acres—about 11 percent less than the 1947–48 average acreage standing on July 1 and about 4 percent less than the 1945–49 average State acreage.

County PMA committees are now completing the establishment of 1950 farm cotton allotments and will mail notices to farm operators about December 10.

All cotton producers who shared in the proceeds of the 1948 crop of cotton are eligible to vote in a cotton marketing quota referendum on December 15. If two-thirds or more of the ballots cast are in favor of marketing quotas on the 1950 crop, quotas will be effective, with the result that the price of 1950 production will be supported at 90 percent of parity to cooperating producers. If more than one-third of those voting oppose quotas, the price of the 1950 crop will be supported at only 50 percent of parity and only to cooperating producers.

Something is wrong. I urge every Member who represents a cotton district to pay very close attention to this legislation as it will be rewritten this time. It is important to the economy of the South that it be rewritten. In my opinion many Texas counties are seriously affected.

I include at this point some letters I have recently received:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
College Station, Tex., December 23, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress, Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: I appreciate your sending me a copy of your letter to Mr. Trigg.

With reference to the correspondence with Judge Roy Selman, of Crockett, I am sure that many farmers in east Texas will be severely penalized under the present cotton allotments that have been issued for their farms. I am not in position to say just how many farms are adversely affected, but most of the cotton farms are affected to some extent. I am hoping that Congress will see fit to enact an amendment to the present law that will relieve the situation in that section of the State. As it now stands, it simply means that many of the cotton farmers in east Texas will not be able to produce very much cotton.

Sincerely yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State PMA Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Carthage, Tex., December 29, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will acknowledge your letter of December 19, 1949, requesting certain data relative to cotton allotments in Panola County, Tex.

In comparing 1950 with 1942 allotments we note that Panola had an allotment of approximately 52,700 acres in 1942 and 17,367 for 1950. These figures include the allotment for new growers also.

You ask about release and reapportionment of unused cotton acreage allotment. We expect very few acres from this source. We estimate 150 for the county. Farmers anticipate changes in procedures and fear that the surrender of cotton allotment may affect any future allotment that would be established on the farm.

We are in bad shape on new grower farms (those who did not grow cotton in any of the years 1946, 1947, or 1948); 1,300 such farms, and only 1,000 acres to distribute. Of this 1,300, at least 400 will apply for a portion of this acreage.

I hesitate to estimate the number of tenants that will be without homes as a result of the small allotments in this county. The big move will start in the spring and after Congress has considered giving some relief. They still have hopes that something better will come their way. No doubt the gentleman from Wills Point, Tex., was about right in his estimates. For an example, in Panola County, in 1942, 0.3145 percent of the cropland was allowed for cotton while in 1950 only 0.1398 percent is allowed.

We appreciate your interest and will gladly furnish any additional information upon request.

With kindest regards, I am,

Yours very truly,

T. L. VINCENT,
Administrative Officer, PMA, Panola County, Tex.

JOAQUIN, TEX., December 17, 1949.

Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH.

DEAR SIR: I got my cotton-acreage allotment the other day. I have been cut down on my cotton acreage to 7 7/10 acres, on a 100-acre farm. They cut the acreage like it was cut in the thirties, by the allowance I had in the thirties.

I have been planting from 35 to 45 acres in cotton for the last 7 or 8 years, and it will be impossible for me to make a living on not less than 20 or 25 acres. For farming is all I know to do. I have 10 children besides my wife and I. And it would be impossible for me to make a living at that small rate of acreage. Farming is the only way I have to pay my debts. For I have had an operation in my family, besides other sickness, which amounts to about $700 this fall.

These men in this office in Panola County has had it in for me since years back, and they will not give me any more acreage. I know of a place just above my place that has not farmed for several years, and he is allowed to plant 10 acres next year. And the family is just the man and wife with two very small children.

I'm trying to educate my children and I cannot educate them or make a living at this rate. I made 14 bales this year, and it takes about 3 acres of my land to make a bale. I made this 14 bales on 45 acres this year. I can prove this statement by my neighbors all over this country.

Please give this letter personal attention so I can make a living, for everyone in this community says I have not been treated fair. My place is cut at about 95 percent. If they cut the whole Nation over at my rate there will not be but about 6,500,000 acres of cotton another year.

I farmed for the Government all the time during the war and lost money on it raising potatoes, tomatoes, and beans. So why can't I have a chance now to make some back? Please give this personal attention and let me know by return mail.

Hoping you all have a merry Christmas and a happy new year.

Yours truly,

ZAN R. MAY.

Please note the answer I received about the May case:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
College Station, Tex., December 28, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your memorandum of December 22 with which you enclosed a copy of a letter from Mr. Zan R. May, route 2, Joaquin, Tex. Mr. May had complained about the 1950 cotton allotment for his 100-acre farm in Panola County.

If Mr. May is dissatisfied with his allotment and can offer facts to substantiate his claim, he may file an application for review of his farm acreage allotment and marketing quota with the county administrative officer, Mr. Tom Vincent, at Carthage. A review of the allotment and quota will be made in due time by a committee of farmers from neighboring counties to determine if Panola County and community committeemen have determined his allotment and quota in accordance with existing regulations and instructions.

It is my opinion that the Panola County committee has determined his allotment correctly. As previously explained, the county allotment seems adequate in view of the acreage of cotton that has been planted on all farms in the county in recent years. However, in making 1950 allotments, the State and county committees were required to apportion the county allotment among farms on which cotton was planted in one or more of the years 1946–48 and also on other farms on which no cotton was planted during these 3 years but on which cotton war-crop credits were determined in 1946 or 1947. I feel that this requirement of law is the reason for the very low allotment established for Mr. May.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

GLADEWATER, TEX.,
December 14, 1949.

Representative LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR LINDLEY: I have a farm in Shelby County and my allotment in 1936, 1937, and 1938 was 23 or 24 acres of bottom but during the war I was unable to have anyone on the farm to farm it. Now I have a renter, Clarence Green, Joaquin, Tex. His allotment is only one acre and I cannot see how this boy can live with a family of six dependents—five children and wife—because there is no kind of public work and there is no market for any produce you can sell on this farm. It looks to me like this boy is either going to have to give up trying to farm or get our cotton acreage raised.

Whoever may this concern, how would you feel in this poor fellow's condition? In other words, there is no job available for the man, nowhere for him to go. Not only this man, but hundreds of others that are in the same situation.

Your friend,

W. M. TAYLOR.

P. S.—In other words, Lindley, during wartimes and say up until the present people could grow stuff on the farms such as hogs, cattle, chickens, and other things and they could grow feed to grow this stuff out. But our markets are beginning to fade away and people cannot get anything out of hogs at the present price. People who have been on the farm have pretty well got the market flooded with any kind of produce you might mention. Furthermore, this poor man on my farm has just come back to the farm without anything and there are others in the same community or in east Texas. LINDLEY, any information you can give me on this matter will be appreciated. In my way of thinking, instead of sending delegates to Europe checking on the situation, they are going to send them to east Texas and Texas.

Please note the answer about the Taylor case:

COLLEGE STATION, TEX., December 23, 1949.
Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
United States Representative,
Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your memorandum of December 16 with which you included an exact copy of a letter from Mr. W. M. Taylor, of route 2, Gladewater, Tex. Mr. Taylor had complained about the 1.2-acre cotton allotment established for his farm.

I feel sure the county PMA committee has established the 1950 cotton allotment for this farm in accordance with the provisions of Public Law 272 passed by the Congress in August. However, it may be that there were errors made on the report of crop acreages and land uses for the years 1945–49 that all farmers made to county committees during the summer of 1949. Mr. Taylor should check these figures with his local county committee.

This law provides among other things that each eligible farm shall have an allotment of not less than the smaller of (a) 5.0 acres or (b) the highest cotton acreage and war-crop credit during the years 1946–48. In all probability no cotton was planted on the farm during the 3 years but a cotton war-crop credit of 1.0 acres was computed. If this assumption is correct, then the allotment has been correctly determined and the farm is not entitled to a larger allotment. Also, if the assumption given above is correct, the farm would not receive a larger allotment under the proposed amendments to existing cotton legislation that were recommended by the House committee on December 13.

I regret that we are unable to give more specific information about this farm since we do not have any records in this office.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

GRAND SALINE, TEX., December 12, 1949.
Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR LINDLEY: I did not plant any cotton in 1946, 1947, or 1948. This year I had a crop and bought a tractor. I have to make special application before I will get to grow any cotton. I owe on my tractor and won't be able to pay for it according to the allotment. I have had the cotton land all the time. I don't think I should be penalized now because I didn't grow cotton the past 3 years.

There are a lot of people around me who are in the same shape I am in. It has been beneficial to our farms and to the price of cotton for us to let land lay out. To restrict the allotment to the last 3 years will certainly penalize the farmers in Van Zandt County. We are wondering if you can help. We have either let our land lay out or have utilized it for something else. We don't see why we can't grow cotton the same as the man who did not diversify and who did not sacrifice in order to reduce the cotton acreage in the first place.

We have already done what the Government is trying to force farmers to do now. We should not be penalized for voluntarily doing that which the Government is now forcing upon us. The fellow who should be favored—instead of favoring him the Government is penalizing him.

Since 1942 I have been in bad health and couldn't farm until this year. Instead of renting I let my land lay out. Now I am being penalized because of the bad condition of my health from 1943 to 1948.

Sincerely yours,

OSIE L. SWAIN.

P. S.—I am also informed that those who did not grow cotton in 1946–47–48 will not be allowed to vote in an election scheduled Deceber 15 in the marketing-quota referendum.

MOUNT SYLVAN, TEX., December 21, 1949.
Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR LINDLEY: Your letter received. Was glad to hear from you in regard to our cotton allotment here in Smith and adjoining counties. I do hope that Congress will make some kind of relief for the east Texas farmers when they meet in January. What is going to become of the tenant farmer? They have taken the very smallest acreage that east Texas ever had to figure the acreage by. I have a farm that had planted 20 acres of cotton in 1948, 1947, and 1946. Will be allowed nine-tenths acre in 1951. Everybody can't go in the cattle business, potato, and watermelons. I do not understand why they are cutting east Texas out on the cotton business.

Lindley, I am going to depend on your doing your best to get Congress to modify this law so that east Texas country can have their just rights.

Hoping you a merry Christmas and a happy New Year.

Your friend,

W. H. BOYNTON.

GRAND SALINE, TEX., December 26, 1949.
Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Washington, D. C.

KIND FRIEND: I am writing you in regard to our farm program.

To me it seems unjust as I have 435 acres of land and 300 acres of this is cropland. When World War II came on all of the tenants left my farm and went to airplane factories and shipyards and me not being able to rent any of my land I went into the stock business a year ago. I was forced by my health to go out of the stock business so I began to try to rent my land and in 1949 I did succeed in getting some of my land worked. However now they tell me because I failed to have any cotton and such like in 1946 and 1947, I am not eligible for any cotton. I do think that they have promised me 4 acres of cotton, and as you know as a farm boy, I cannot rent my land without some cotton acreage. I do not believe that it was the intention of Congress for all of this land to lay out.

Lindley, as you know this is my only source of income to exist and I was wondering if anything can be done at this late hour, so I thought it best that you should know how this set-up is going.

Hoping that you and your family are enjoying the best of health, I am

Sincerely yours,

HENRY A. GODWIN.

GRAND SALINE, TEX., December 27, 1949.
Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you in regard to my cotton allotment.

I borrowed the money to buy my farm and tractor through the FHA. I can't pay for this without any cotton. The only 3 years that I did not plant cotton was in 1945, 1946, and 1947.

I raised truck and feed. I have one neighbor who got 9 acres. He has not planted any cotton in 10 years. There is plenty of that over the county.

I hate to bother you with this letter, but I sure would appreciate it if you could help me get some cotton.

I have supported you in every campaign that you have made.

Hoping to hear from you soon.

Your friend,

E. J. HALE.

BEN WHEELER, TEX., December 26, 1949.
Mr. BECKWORTH.

DEAR SIR: I am a farmer, have farmed in Van Zandt County all of my life, and am 36 years old. Was raised on a 495-acre farm here in this part of the county. My father sold our farm in 1937 and have rented ever since. You might say I was raised in the cotton patch. In the past 3 years I have lived on a place where the landlord worked in town, but he is going to work his place himself next year (1950), so I bought a nearby farm of 460 acres—some 175 in cultivation in 1942. It had 57 acres of cotton allotment in 1941. It had planted 54 acres of cotton on it. (I owe for most of it.) But for the past few years (as the owner was old) he leased it to a man who put cows on it and did not farm it. The place where I have been working has an allotment on the record of my farming, but I have not got any allotment on the farm I bought, where I am moving, because it had no cotton on it in the past 3 or 4 years.

We are calling for help for farms which do not have allotments while others have allotments. Mr. BECKWORTH, the only fair way is to treat everybody alike. I am a farmer. If my neighbor is allowed a certain percent of his cultivation acres, I want the same percent of my cultivation acres. If a cotton renter has to move on a farm where there has been no cotton previously, he can't get any cotton; therefore, he cannot borrow money on his crop. If we don't get the same percent of our cultivation acres of allotment on cotton as our neighbor (who probably doesn't have to change farms), there certainly will be unrest and dissatisfaction.

Your cooperation and help will be appreciated.

Yours truly,

S. C. HUFF.

DECEMBER 22, 1949.
Congressman LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: I am writing you this letter in behalf of the farmers of East Texas. I shall use myself for example: I live 12 miles east of Tyler on a 175-acre farm. I have farmed all of my life except for the 2 years spent in World War I. During the years 1946, 1947, 1948 I did public work. This year I went back to farming. I have 165 acres in cultivation of which I planted 20 acres to cotton.

The new law which was voted into existence prohibits me from planting any cotton because I haven't any cotton history.

I went to the triple-A office to enter my application for the allotment of the cotton acreage. I was informed that there would be only an acre or so; therefore, I withdrew my application. I have no alternative but try to get a public job, unless I grow cotton regardless of the law.

I am obligated to my family. I have a daughter in college, which I had hopes of seeing finish. I believe that if our lawmakers had experience in farming we would have better laws for the interest of the farmers.

As I see the situation they are penalizing the wrong man; they should penalize the man planting 3,000 acres instead of the man with only 30 acres. The large planter is causing the surplus, not the one that has only a minimum number of acres. Seems to me that the lawmakers are too busy taking care of the big producers and not giving the small producer any consideration at all.

Don't you believe that there is discrimination in this law? In your honest opinion don't you believe it is unconstitutional? The farmers do not need a dole, what they need is a dependable market.

I shall expect you to do the utmost in your power to relieve us of these difficulties. To support my family properly I shall need at least 20 acres of cotton.

Cordially yours,

F. P. BOULTER.

BEN WHEELER, TEX.

L. BECKWORTH,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you to see if you can help me get some cotton acreage on this place.

I live on the Paul Gigler's place, and it has about 175 acres in cultivation. I raised cotton on this place this year. The 1949 cotton crop was the first cotton crop since 1941. I had 23 acres this year and made 9 bales of cotton. If I could be allowed about 20 acres this year I could make it fine.

I have 8 children at home and I have to feed and clothe them.

There are several farmers around me that were allowed good cotton acreage, and yet they haven't planted any cotton in 10 or 12 years.

The banks will not loan money if you don't have some cotton acreage. I have plenty of security to put up to the bank but they will not loan any money unless you have a cotton crop.

Mr. BECKWORTH, I need some cotton acreage bad, and I will deeply appreciate your cooperation.

Yours truly,

W. H. HOPSON.

P. S.—I have no other means of supporting my family other than raising cotton. Thank you.

GRAND SALINE, TEX.,
December 23, 1949.

Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH.

DEAR SIR: I did not get any cotton acreage for the year of 1950. I wonder just why. Seems to me like it was an unfair thing. They tell me it was because I did not have cotton in 1946–47–48.

I had truck crops and seems they did not give me credit for any war crops. Way things are going to be next year we may not can sell truck stuff, and we have a farm to pay for. I am expecting you to do all you can to help me get an allotment. I think each farm should have a few acres don't you?

We have 112½ acres and 75 acres in cultivation and are not allowed any cotton at all.

I appreciate whatever you can do to help me.

ARLIE E. HOLLOWELL.

GRAND SALINE, TEX.,
December 15, 1949.

Mr. BECKWORTH,
Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: Us farmers are greatly disturbed over this cotton allotment. We are in favor of governmental control of cotton acreage, but us little farmers are not in it at all. I have a little 100-acre farm. Have been in bad health for 5 years. 1947 and 1948 I didn't have 1 acre on my place in cotton, so I am not allowed to vote, or have any cotton either. I am wondering if our Government has completely turned on us little farmers. It seems like the ones that owns thousands of acres of wheat and cotton lands are fully protected. Has our Government forgot the Golden Rule and have they forgot equal rights to all men, special privileges to none?

I have one neighbor who has bought a tractor and the farm he owns didn't have any cotton on it at all in 1947 and 1948. So what is he to do? He is not allowed but very little cotton, if any. I have several neighbors in the same shape. They are poor, hard-working people and good people.

Mr. BECKWORTH, can you get Congress, you and Mr. CONNALLY and Mr. JOHNSON, to have this cotton allotment changed some so the little farmers can live through it? If the farmers all have to plant cabbage, potatoes, tomatoes, and sweet corn for living, there won't be any market for it.

Hoping there can be something done and with best wishes.

W. I. CREW AND WIFE.

GRAND SALINE, TEX., December 16, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Gilmer, Tex.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I imagine you are hearing from quite a few dissatisfied cotton farmers about Government control of acreage. They are all for price supports, however. I see no possible way of having price support without some kind of production control, but the method of determining allotments is very unfair. If we had a law that would prevent a man planting more than 50 percent of his acreage to cotton and preventing planting cotton 2 years in succession on the same land, we would have very little need for price support and no need for any other control of cotton production and such a law would be fair to everybody. Furthermore such a law would be justified as a soil-conservation measure.

If this suggestion meets with your approval, will you please give it your immediate attention at the coming session of the Congress?

Very truly yours,

HOMER E. TUNNELL,
A retired cotton farmer.

Mr. Speaker, note at this point the answer to the Tunnell letter:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
College Station, Tex., December 28, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of December 22, with which you enclosed a copy of a letter from Mr. Homer E. Tunnell, a retired cotton farmer of Grand Saline, Tex. Mr. Tunnell had suggested that the cotton-acreage allotment and marketing-quota program should prevent a farm allotment in excess of 50 percent of the cropland and should require the rotation of cotton acreage each year.

In general, we agree with the suggestion that a farm allotment should not exceed 50 percent of the cropland in the farm. However, some exceptions need to be made, especially for small farms where a larger acreage of cotton needs to be produced in order that the people depending on the small farm for a living can have sufficient cash crop acreage for this purpose. Also, we agree with the suggestion that cotton acreage should be rotated on the farm each year, but do not feel that such a provision need be written into law. It is the job of the Extension Service, Soil Conservation Service, and others who work with farmers to show that crop rotation is desirable and profitable.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: The following information is in reply to your request of December 19, 1949:

County cotton-acreage allotment for 1942, 4,096.7 acres. County cotton-acreage allotment for 1950, 714.2 acres.

Since the county allotment for 1950 is so small it is felt that only a small acreage of perhaps 50 would be released for reapportionment.

Our allotments are all very small, which means that landlords who farm themselves will not be able to have any tenants. If each acre of war crops were considered as an acre of cotton, our allotment would probably double, which would be quite a relief over the present situation.

Under the present law we will have an estimated 75 farmers who will not be able to grow any cotton because of the lack of an acreage allotment.

Yours very truly,

T. H. INMAN,
Chairman, Newton County PMA Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Livingston, Tex., December 30, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress, Third District, Texas, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with your request of recent date the following information is furnished for and by Polk County for cotton and war crops.

The cotton allotment for Polk County in 1941 was 16,384.3 acres. (Reference 504 GA.)

The cotton-acreage allotment for 1950 is 4,754.4 acres.

The following information is taken from a tabulation of the 532–C as filed by farm operators and owners in the spring of 1949:

Year 1945:
Cotton planted	5,901
War crops	3,258
Year 1946:
Cotton planted	4,777
War crops	3,414
Year 1947:
Cotton planted	4,919
War crops	3,409
Year 1948:
Cotton planted	6,556
War crops	-----

According to our interpretation of the instructions for establishing allotments credit for war crops was given credit just the same as if the farmer had planted the acreage of cotton. On the other hand it is our understanding that when allotments were issued to each county, only the acreages of cotton for the various years were considered and no consideration given to the war crops grown for the years in question.

Furthermore, your attention is called to the acreages of cotton reported for Polk County by the BAE.

Year 1945: Cotton	5,050
Year 1946: Cotton	2,940
Year 1948: Cotton	5,200

In accordance with instructions for computing cotton allotments for the county the committeemen were compelled to adjust the acreages of cotton on the farms down to the point where the acreage would agree with the BAE estimate. It is the opinion of the county committee that the community committeemen did a very good job in securing acreage history and that their knowledge of the plantings of cotton was far more accurate than that of the BAE.

An examination of the foregoing figures will indicate that Polk County has diverted approximately 50 percent of its cotton land to other crops since 1941. The present allotment as now established will work extreme hardships on those who have continued throughout the years to produce cotton. As the situation is now, there will be a number of tenant farmers displaced. Where will these tenant farmers go? They cannot go to another farm because the other cotton farms cannot absorb them as the allotment is not sufficient.

The county factor for Polk County is 16 percent. That means that no farm, whatever the amount of cotton planted each year, could receive more than 16 acres of cotton for each 100 acres of cropland. A number of farmers have consistently planted from 50 to 80 percent of their cropland to cotton. When the county factor is applied to such farms it practically means that this type of farmer is ruined.

As the situation now stands it seems that we are encouraging unemployment or asking for another WPA. None of us have use for parasites. There is only one real wealth. It is the product of man's mind and skill and sweat.

Very truly yours,

JETT G. BROCK,
Chairman, Polk County PMA Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
College Station, Tex., December 28, 1949.

HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of December 23 in which you have raised two questions as to how the cotton allotment and marketing quota program will affect cotton farmers.

Section 344 (f) of the AAA Act of 1938, as amended, provides that "the county acreage allotment less not to exceed the percentage provided for in paragraph 3 of this subsection shall be apportioned to farms on which cotton has been planted (or regarded as having been planted) in any one of the 3 years immediately preceding the year for which such allotment is determined."

As we understand this provision, 1950 cotton allotments are determined for farms and not for farmers. Also, for 1950 the allotment is based on the history of the farm during the years 1946, 1947, and 1948, as well as the amount of cropland in the farm. Conceivably then, there might be genuine cotton farmers who will operate farms in 1950 for which allotments cannot be established under the provisions of the law. Even in these few cases, it is possible for county committees to establish group II or new farm allotments to the extent that the county reserve acreage set aside for this purpose will permit.

It is my opinion that very few, if any, genuine cotton farmers will be denied the privilege of growing some cotton during the 1950 crop year.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECKWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. GATHINGS. I want to say that the gentleman's predictions that amendments are necessary to be made to the cotton-acreage allotment legislation have no doubt come to pass, and I congratulate the gentleman on his very fine fight to remove any inequities which might exist. I recall that you were the only Member to take the floor and state that the legislation on cotton-acreage allotments as contained in the Agricultural Act of 1949 was unworkable.

Mr. BECKWORTH. I predicted it, and I predict this, that if this legislation is not materially changed now, it will be changed again in the future because people have to be given a live and let live situation.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECKWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me say to the gentleman from Texas that when he made his protest, when the bill was before the House, I joined him.

This is one of the most dangerous steps toward regimentation of the farmers of this country that has ever been taken, and if it is carried to its ultimate you will not only drive the little cotton farmer from his field, as you are doing now; but you will tell a man how much corn he can raise, how much wheat he can raise, how many cows he can milk, how many beef cattle and hogs he can sell, and how many chickens and eggs he can sell. The law ought to be repealed.

Mr. BECKWORTH. I do recall the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] warned of the serious effects of the legislation if it were not changed.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECKWORTH. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. I have just introduced a resolution to correct some of the inequities that have resulted from the application of the law enacted in the last session, and I hope the gentleman will avail himself of the opportunity to read this resolution.

Mr. BECKWORTH. When will the hearings begin?

Mr. COOLEY. We hope we will not have to have hearings, but we will consider it on the 10th of the month in the committee.

Mr. BECKWORTH. I think that is a most significant statement, the fact that perhaps we shall not have hearings. In my opinion there was never a piece of legislation on which hearings are needed worse than this. The people certainly need to have a chance to have their story told.

Mr. RANKIN. I agree with the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. COOLEY. I think the gentleman realizes that we have already heard enough to know that the bill needs to be amended. Now, if the gentleman wants to be heard before the committee, perhaps I can arrange to hear the gentleman.

Mr. BECKWORTH. That is very considerate, and I am sure I shall want to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

CHAMBER DECORATIONS

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to comment shortly on something that is vital to everybody sitting here, and that is these decorations which have just been installed.

I think the new decorations in the Chamber now bring it up to the level of the average movie house. But I cannot understand why in heaven's name the committee gave us all paint and decorations and did not do anything about these hard seats. I have been sitting here for 5 years on these very same board seats, and some of us are not born with the proper cushions. Certainly we people who were not precushioned should have some consideration.

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee that has charge of the remodeling of this Chamber, I might say to the distinguished gentleman and my friend from Pennsylvania that I appreciate his remarks relative to the seating, the lighting, the acoustics, and I beg to advise the seating arrangements will be taken care of this coming summer. It was impossible for the contractor to complete all the remodeling between the period that Congress adjourned and the time that we reconvened. But, under the program established, the remodeling will continue after Congress has adjourned this coming year and we hope by January 1951 the project will be completed as per plans.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGREGOR. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I certainly trust that the gentleman will confine his remarks to the decorations in the Chamber and not mention the Rose Bowl game yesterday.

Mr. McGREGOR. I thank the capable gentleman from California and am glad to bring to the attention of the House that great feat of yesterday when Ohio State University defeated the University of California. A contest of real sportsmanship exemplified by two great universities from two great States——

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGREGOR. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. STEFAN. What became of the State seals?

Mr. McGREGOR. Replicas of the State seals are in the ceiling.

Mr. STEFAN. What became of the old ones?

Mr. McGREGOR. They are being repaired and are in storage. The committee is giving consideration as to what to do with them and we certainly will be glad to receive suggestions from any of the Members on how to dispose of them. No definite plan of action has yet been decided upon. We certainly are open to suggestions and your recommendations will be considered by the committee and then final action will be taken with full approval of the leadership and we hope to the satisfaction of as many Members as possible.

Mr. STEFAN. My State of Nebraska had two seals in the ceiling here, a State seal and a Territorial seal. Have they been replaced?

Mr. McGREGOR. I cannot answer the gentleman, but I will say that there will be a replica of each State and each Territorial seal. We will have the same number of seals, both of States and Territories, in the ceiling as prior to the remodeling.

Mr. STEFAN. However, some States had two seals. We had two seals.

Mr. McGREGOR. We will be very glad to check it for the gentleman and I recognize his interest and helpful suggestion.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include certain excerpts from various publications.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

[Mr. RANKIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

THE LATE CLYDE M. REED

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my sad and painful duty to inform the House of the death of CLYDE M. REED, late a Senator from Kansas, at his home in Parsons, Labette County, Kans., on November 8.

CLYDE REED came to Labette County, Kans., at the age of 4 and remained a resident of that county for the rest of his life. Most of his adult years were spent in the public service. He was appointed to the railway mail service while quite a young man and spent 28 years in the Post Office Department. During that time he advanced rapidly to positions of responsibility and at the time of his resignation in 1910, had risen to one of the highest positions in the career service of the Department.

He resigned from the Government service to take over the active management of the Parsons (Kans.) Sun and remained the editor and publisher of that paper until his death. He made it one of the leading newspapers in a State which is noted for the high quality of its public press.

CLYDE REED did not reenter public life until 1919 when he became secretary to Gov. Henry J. Allen, who in 1920 appointed him as a member of the new Kansas Court of Industrial Relations. In 1921 Governor Allen appointed him as chairman of the Kansas Public Utilities Commission in which capacity he served until 1924. In 1928 CLYDE REED was elected Governor of Kansas and served from 1929 to 1931. In 1938 he became a candidate for the United State Senate and was successful in both the primary and general election at a time when many people felt that a Republican candidate had little chance to win.

During and between his periods of public service CLYDE REED made an intense and thorough study of transportation and became one of the country's greatest authorities in that very complex and difficult field. As a transportation expert both in and out of public life, he rendered a great service to the Middle West in bringing about more equitable transportation rates.

In the Senate of the United States CLYDE REED was a most active and effective Member. His preeminence in the field of transportation was quickly recognized. Much of his work was done as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, but he was active in other fields, notably agriculture and appropriations. CLYDE REED was outstanding both because of his industry and ability. He went to the bottom of every problem he considered. These qualifications were matched only by his courage and it is perhaps this latter quality which will be remembered longest both by his friends and his enemies. By his very nature CLYDE REED was destined to have strong friends and strong enemies. It was not in him to compromise. When he reached a conclusion he stood by it and both his friends and his enemies can testify that he never ducked a fight. Sometimes he won and sometimes he lost, but in either case the opposition always knew there had been a fight. There was rarely if ever anything personal about CLYDE REED's fights and many of his enemies in one battle might very well be his friends in the next one.

CLYDE REED lived a full life. He died in harness just as he would have wished. Very few men crammed into 78 years as much effort and activity as he did. His life typifies the opportunity which exists in America. Starting out as a poor boy, his intelligence, industry, and courage carried him to the top. He and Mrs. Reed had a family of seven children, all of whom have distinguished themselves in various activities of life, and who with his gracious wife survive him. Our heartfelt sympathy goes to all of them in their loss of a husband and father.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, in the passing of Senator CLYDE M. REED, the State of Kansas, as well as the country at large, has sustained the loss of one of its outstanding public servants.

Senator REED was an ardent student of public affairs. He was a hard worker and devoted his time and attention to dealing with problems affecting his State and his country. He was one of those men who had a rare—a keen sense of justice. He did not hesitate to express and defend his views on public questions.

Senator REED spent many years in public service. He was in the postal service for a considerable period of time. He served with distinction on the Public Utilities Commission of Kansas. As Governor of the State, he made an outstanding record. I know of no one who worked harder and gave more of his energy and his time to service of the people than did Senator REED.

Senator REED disagreed frequently, but he disagreed honestly and honorably.. He was courageous in his stand for what he believed to be right. To his devoted family, we desire to extend our deepest sympathy. The Congress of the United States has suffered a great loss in his passing.

The words of a familiar poem are especially appropriate on this occasion:

God give us men! A time like this demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and ready hands;
Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who have honor—men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before a demagog
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking!
Tall men, sun crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCRIVNER].

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, in the passing of Senator CLYDE M. REED, Kansas lost one of its colorful political figures.

Though many did not agree with him on some issues, everyone admired him for his direct, courageous, outspoken convictions. Wherever and whenever Kansans gather and talk politics, the name of Senator CLYDE REED will be heard—it will be long remembered and highly respected.

The family, to whom heartfelt sympathy is extended, lost a fine father. Kansas lost an outstanding citizen, one who will always be among the State's great men.

May the memory of his courage and his loyalty long be an inspiration to Americans everywhere.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the Kansas motto is "To the stars, through difficulty." Senator CLYDE M. REED, of Kansas, was a man whose able, conscientious and courageous life symbolized the path trod in arriving at the stars through difficulty. To Senator REED barriers were merely paving stones in his path to great accomplishments. He never chose the easy way, but the one he believed right. He thrived on opposition and, on the other hand, was a loyal friend.

Kansas mourns the passing of its statesman. Kansas is proud of his record and the State will always, in the future, as it has in the past, remember Senator REED as one of its favorite sons.

I feel a distinct personal loss in his passing, because of his exceptional courtesies and kindnesses to me since I have been in Washington.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MEYER].

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to join with my colleagues in paying tribute to the late Senator REED.

In the passing of Senator REED the State and Nation have lost a great and fearless leader who was uncompromising in battling for the preservation of our American way of life. He was my good personal friend and always an inspiration to me in my congressional work. He has left a lasting imprint for good in our national well-being. He was a warrior for integrity in the public service.

Although Senator REED is no longer with us the principles for which he stood and the prodigious work which he did in the Senate will always leave a lasting impression.

Mr. KEOGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to serve with the late distinguished Senator REED from Kansas as a member of the Board of Visitors to the United States Maritime Academy. In that service I came to know and respect him for his application to his duty, his intimate grasp of the details of the operations of an institution of that type. I am sure that I bespeak the sentiments of the members of the Board that the Senate has lost a great man and the country a great public servant.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD on the life and character of Senator CLYDE M. REED.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

THE LATE CLYDE M. REED

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 409), which I send to the desk, and I move its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. CLYDE M. REED, a Senator of the United States from the State of Kansas.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOPE asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and also to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial on the life of his father by Clyde M. Reed, Jr.

THE LATE HONORABLE GEORGE J. BATES

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 410), which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. GEORGE J. BATES, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and in that extension that I may include a eulogy by Archbishop Cushing, of Boston.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it is a sad duty that I have today, to offer this resolution concerning the death of an old and honored colleague, and a friend whose friendship I had cherished for many years.

It was with great sorrow and a distinct shock that we heard a few short weeks ago of the death of our colleague, GEORGE J. BATES, of Massachusetts. Mr. BATES had been at his home in Massachusetts when he received a call to attend a meeting of the Armed Services Committee. In order that he might attend that session of the committee, he was obliged to take an airplane. We all know the terrible story; as the ship was entering the Washington Airport, a tragedy ensued which caused his death. Thus died a fine, Christian gentleman; a leader of men and a man who served his country devotedly and with great distinction.

The career of Mr. BATES was one of the outstanding careers of Massachusetts. It resembled very much the old Horatio Alger stories; a story possible only in America. Born in Salem of humble parentage, he had a distinguished public career, and was honored and respected, not only by all those who knew him but everywhere throughout the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the country.

He worked in early manhood in the shops of Salem. His neighbors and friends came to appreciate his ability and manly qualities, and he was selected to become a member of the State legislature. Here he served creditably for 7 years, then served as mayor of the city of Salem for 14 years, and as one of our colleagues in this House for 14 years. In every instance he gave complete satisfaction and left an enviable record of achievement. He was a man who had a passion for service. He liked to serve the people. He liked to make his country a stronger and a better country. Perhaps few men ever had a greater loyalty for the Navy than did he. In his district, history records, was the birthplace of the American Navy.

He realized the greatness of America's past had been largely due to the strength and the prowess of its Navy. He devoted his fine talents to making the American Navy so strong that it would be superior to the navy that any other nation might put afloat.

He fought vigorously for the industries of New England, to improve the position of the workers from whom he came and whom he loved.

So this man of peace served the people most of his adult life.

It was quite appropriate, if death had to come, that it should come while traveling to attend a committee meeting. He died serving a cause he had loved.

GEORGE BATES was a family man. He had a charming wife and a large family of boys and girls who had been reared with his own fine characteristics of honesty, integrity, and love of country.

Today we honor a great man, a splendid son of Massachusetts, a man who, had he lived, would unquestionably have been called by the people to serve in a higher post. Fate decided otherwise. He is dead. We have all lost a fine friend, one whom we honored and respected. This earth is poorer for his departure but richer for his contributions.

To his wife and family go, I am sure, the heartfelt sympathy of all of us privileged to know him.

May he find in the other world above that reward he so abundantly earned.

Mr. Speaker, I think it most fitting on this occasion to extend at this point in my remarks the eulogy of Archbishop Richard J. Cushing for our late colleague:

It is not usual to pronounce eulogies at the funerals in our churches. A profound Catholic instinct impels us to commend our blessed dead to the judgment of God with the prayerful hope that they may be numbered among His saints. It is our belief that from the moment of the change which removes our loved ones from our sight to give them the blessed vision of God, all their earthly titles, qualities, and renown become of little or no importance. He who has God totally and perfectly, as we pray that our dead possess Him, no longer has need of our praise. He who loses God cannot be helped by any words of ours. So we pray for our dead, but we do not presume to praise them in the hour of their passing.

This abstention from eulogies, therefore, conforms with the spirit of the church. It is also consistent with the humble, quiet character of most of our people. It is particularly consistent with the whole tenor of the life and personality of the God-fearing, self-effacing Christian gentleman and public servant for whom we are met to pray this morning.

Congressman BATES would have been the last to ask a eulogy. In fact, it would never have occurred to him to request that there be no eulogy, since it would not have entered his mind that words of praise would be spoken in his regard from this sacred place.

If only for that reason, I pause this morning before the church gives him her final absolution and her blessing to bespeak our admiration for him, our sympathy with his family and friends, and our confidence that their spouse, father, and leader is truly and safely in the hands of God.

I did not know Congressman BATES personally. I had met him many times on public occasions where our respective duties brought us together. But it is a proof of his retiring simplicity that far more people, myself among them, knew his merits than knew the man himself. That is at once the most accurate and the most enviable tribute to him: that even without knowing him personally, many, many thousands knew his high worth and the tremendous good that he did.

Congressman BATES was born in nearby Peabody, and all the days and the deeds of his life in Salem were identified with the service of this New England city. As a member of the Massachusetts Great and General Court, he represented Salem when first he entered public life, more than 30 years ago. He was mayor of Salem for many years until 1937. Since that year until now he represented the area which includes Salem in the Congress of the United States. He never outgrew his home town. Though all the Nation and even the world benefited from him and mourns his passing, Salem especially is the poorer for his death.

A public servant and therefore obliged to live no small part of his life before the public eye, the Congressman remained nonetheless a retiring personality and he did not obtrude his personal preferences or his family life upon public notice.

The son of parents both born in Ireland, he was indebted to that same holy place for the devoted wife who holds first place in our sympathy today. God gave them nine children, of whom seven have survived to be the fairest monument to their father and the sweetest consolation of his spouse. Despite his great love for his family and his pride in them, the Congressman gave a magnificent example in the objectivity with which he subordinated family affection to public responsibility in his use of the power which went with his office.

I have heard him frequently praised for the fact that his sons and his daughters volunteered for naval service and neither expected nor received from their father special consideration or undue pressure in their behalf. That fact should be a great consolation to them now that he is dead; it is a great tribute to his memory.

Long before World War II the Congressman was prudently concerned about national strength and about the moral obligation of national preparedness. He was conservative by character and in his political and social opinions, but his conservatism had sane and sound roots in his own background. That background included his descent from hard-working people, frugal, conscientious, self-reliant, and self-respecting. His own first job as a young man was in a foundry where he early made his acquaintance with hard work and with the true problems of those who labor.

Congressman BATES did not have unusual opportunities for education, but he acquired great wisdom. He was not a joiner or socially ambitious in any sense, yet he made many and firm friends in every class. He did not use his race or his religion or his fraternal connections to advance his personal or political interests, though I am told that he originally sought public office at the urging of his brothers in division 18, of the Ancient Order of Hibernians. They trusted him—and he did not betray their trust.

No scandal attached to his name. Great good was patiently, quietly, persistently promoted by this man through all the years of his public life. His official success and public progress did not corrupt his private integrity or personal character. He labored hard for the city of man but he did not forfeit his place in the city of God. He has worked hard. He deserves the eternal rest, the peace and the life in God which we beg for him before God's altar here this morning.

Just before he left on his journey to Washington the other morning he knelt as did all Catholics, to hear mass for the feast of All Saints. Before the journey could reach its earthly destination he was, as we confidently pray, himself among the saints, enjoying that clear vision of God, the desire for which prompted him to be present at mass on that fateful day. It was almost the last act of his life. It was a beautiful symbol of the holiness of his death.

Eternal rest grant unto him. O Lord! May his soul and all the souls of the faithful departed through the mercy of God rest in peace. Amen.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK].

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, my memories of service in public life with and friendship for GEORGE BATES go back to 1920 when we both served in the House of Representatives of the Massachusetts Legislature. George Bates was one of the most dynamic members of the legislature, and served in that body for a number of years. During part of that time he also served as mayor of his city. He was one of the most remarkable men I have ever met, a man of great ability, of deep faith, a man of courage, and a man of loyalty. As the years went by between 1920 and the time of his tragic death, our paths in public service came together again in the halls of Congress. As Members of this body our friendship became stronger and stronger. I have said on several occasions, and I repeat now, that the middle aisle is meaningless in the friendships that we form. I am in politics a Democrat; GEORGE BATES in politics was a Republican, but that meant nothing to us in our friendship, and it means nothing to those of us who serve now and who will serve in the future; friendship transcends everything else, particularly that which relates to political considerations. GEORGE BATES was a true friend. His family life was outstanding; a good husband, a good father, a good legislator, a good friend. God in His Wisdom took him in the tragic way He did and I have every confidence that his soul is with his Maker now.

I attended the funeral of our late colleague, and the people of the city of Salem gave him one of the greatest tributes I have ever seen.

In the death of GEORGE BATES, Massachusetts has lost one of its outstanding sons, the Nation one of its great citizens.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON].

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, in the tragic death of our colleague, the Honorable GEORGE J. BATES, the Congress has lost an able legislator; the Armed Services have lost a stanch advocate; the American people have lost an outstanding statesman; and I have lost a very close personal friend.

Words alone cannot express my feeling nor can they possibly convey to his family my sorrow.

GEORGE J. BATES represented all that is good in man. His personal life was exemplary. His public life was beyond reproach. He devoted himself to his family, his church, and his country. I know of no man in many years as a Member of this body who dedicated himself so unselfishly to the American people, without regard to his own welfare.

The majority of the years of his life were spent in public service as a member of the Massachusetts State Legislature, as mayor of Salem, and as a Representative in this body since the Seventy-fifth Congress, when he became a member of the Naval Affairs Committee. When that committee and the Military Affairs Committee were combined into the Armed Services Committee, he continued to contribute to the Congress and to the American people the wisdom and zeal which characterized him throughout his public service.

Possessed of amazing energy, endowed with a keen mind, blessed with a sense of humor, he lived a full life in the time allotted to him. Tenacious in his conviction, but lovable in his reasonableness, always devoted to the large view of public affairs—he demonstrated all of the characteristics of statesmanship.

GEORGE BATES' death was truly a tragedy, a tragedy the Nation can ill afford. It was typical of his life that his death occurred while in the performance of his official duties. He would not have been a passenger on the ill-fated airliner that carried him to his death had he not been en route to an official orientation conference in the office of the Secretary of Defense, pursuant to the Secretary's invitation.

GEORGE BATES died while on active duty. He was not only a member of the Armed Services Committee, he was a part of our armed services.

At his funeral he was surrounded by the people he loved best, his family and his thousands of friends in the city of Salem. Our committee—his committee—arranged for a military escort. It was fitting that members of services he so ably represented should have accompanied him to his last resting place.

While we pay him today this passing tribute, his contributions to the Nation's defense will everlastingly stand as his fitting memorial.

Mr. Speaker, I miss him more than I can say.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it is most fitting that GEORGE BATES be eulogized on this opening day of Congress. He was so much a part of our work and so willing always to take his share of the sometimes tedious labor of legislation. He never shirked his duty, and it was this devotion to his job that was responsible for his being aboard that fateful airplane flight that ended so disastrously. He was on his way to Washington for conferences in connection with the national defense investigation. He died in line of duty just as much as any soldier who fell before the enemy.

Massachusetts has lost a loyal son, a most capable legislator, and a fearless fighter for her interests. His long service as mayor of his home city of Salem, his equally fine record in the Massachusetts Legislature, and his 13 years of faithful service in this House of Representatives gave him a national prominence that was justly earned and richly deserved. He was a power in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. He was a power in the Congress. He was a power in the Nation. He was exceptionally kindly, always ready to help those who needed the benefit of his wide experience and his good judgment. I remember so well his kindness to me, his generosity, at the time of the redistricting in Massachusetts of the congressional districts. My friends and others felt that the district as mapped by the committee was such that it would be very difficult for a Republican to carry. GEORGE BATES gave over the historic old town of Andover to me to have in my congressional district. Later on he was requested by the committee on redistricting to give it back; that is, to take it away from me. But GEORGE BATES stood firm. As a result, I have the town of Andover in my district, for which I am very grateful.

He will be sorely missed by all of us. In his work upon the Committee on Armed Services he fought valiantly for the rights and prestige of our Navy. He showed great anxiety and distress because he felt the weakening of the Navy would prove disastrous to the security of our Nation. Essentially just himself, he felt that the action against the Navy was unwise, unjust, and very dangerous.

To his gracious and lovely widow and helpmate and his fine family go the condolences of all of his host of friends. Through the years to come we shall not forget him, and we shall miss greatly his cheerful, kindly presence here in Congress. We shall miss the inspiration of his deeply religious character and his sterling qualities of mind and heart. I personally shall miss him tremendously because I knew that he was a friend who could always be depended upon to be helpful, to be generous, to be patriotic, and to be a statesman.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT].

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, GEORGE JOSEPH BATES was the highest type of public servant. He was clean, courageous, capable, and though one could doubt the wisdom of his judgment or disagree at times with the conclusions he reached, no one could ever question the honesty of his purpose, the sincerity of his motive or the unimpeachable integrity of his unsullied soul. He wore no man's collar and could not be bought or sold by any power on this earth.

Serving with distinction and ability in the Massachusetts Legislature for 7 years, a period long enough to test the mettle of any man, he was honored by the people of his home city, who knew him best, by being elected mayor of that city for 14 consecutive years. This long experience gave him a lasting interest in municipal government. It is significant to note that immediately after coming to Congress, Mr. BATES was placed on the Committee for the District of Columbia and devoted much time and energy, without any hope of reward back home, to the affairs of our Nation's Capital. He was always alert and appreciative of the complex, difficult problems that confront the city of Washington, and was the ranking Republican member of the Committee on the District of Columbia at the time of his death.

It was my privilege the year after GEORGE BATES was first elected to this body to speak at a huge political gathering in his home town of Salem, and the year following at another town, Haverhill, in his district. I learned then why GEORGE BATES was elected not only to the Legislature of Massachusetts and mayor of his home town, but also as a Member of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States. It was because he loved people and people loved him.

I do not believe there is any man I have ever met who was more accommodating or who would go out of his way to render assistance not only to the people in his own district, regardless of political affiliations, but to his colleagues in this body, than GEORGE BATES. In former years he served under the able and distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], chairman of the old Committee on Naval Affairs, and contributed much to making the Navy of the United States during this recent war far more powerful than all the other combined navies in the world, and since the unification of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Naval Affairs into the Committee on the Armed Services, GEORGE BATES has given the same unselfish service, the same unstinted energy, the same complete devotion to building up not only the Navy, but equally the Air Force and the Army, because he realized that in modern mechanized warfare each branch of the service is indispensable to victory.

So, we are going to miss him sorely as a member of our committee. He was a man of such tremendous energy, dynamic personality, and restless spirit; never satisfied with present accomplishments but always striving to do more. He had strong convictions and was not timid in expressing them. Independent as he was he could cooperate with others. I was on the S. S. America in mid-Atlantic when the radio brought the shocking news of his sudden and tragic death. My heart sank within me because I knew that this country had lost a great, honest, courageous, and constructive statesman, but more personal than that, I knew I had lost a very dear and loyal friend. Never have I, as ranking minority member of the Committee on Armed Services, asked GEORGE BATES to do one thing that he did not willingly and gladly welcome the opportunity, and he always performed his task well. He was a glutton for work. Industry was a virtue to him; he practiced it.

In closing, I wish to say this. I am glad it was mentioned by the distinguished majority leader the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] who knew him so well, that GEORGE BATES was a man of deep faith. Ordinarily I do not suppose many people would have guessed offhand that GEORGE BATES was a deeply religious man, because he did not wear his heart on his sleeve; but I recall how deeply he was moved when he heard of the death of his son-in-law who served in the Navy in the Pacific during the recent war.

I recall more clearly the two different occasions when we visited his holiness Pope Pius at his summer retreat at Castel Gandolfo on the outskirts of Rome. I remember how deeply GEORGE BATES was moved. No one can have an audience with the present Pope without leaving a much bigger and a better person. Twice I had an audience with His Holiness and I know how GEORGE BATES was moved, as all of us were moved, by the Pope's piety, learning, humility, and genuine desire for permanent peace in this world.

I am a Protestant and a Mason, but I think the Roman Catholic Church has been one of the greatest stabilizing influences in this modern war-torn world. Mr. BATES, though he was a Catholic and I am a Methodist, knew that the deep undercurrent of men's faith, whether religious or political, transcends minor differences that men's minds might entertain.

So I want to join with my colleagues in paying my humble and altogether too feeble tribute to a great and good man. I have been in his home. I know what a devoted father and what a loyal and faithful husband he was. To really know a man one must associate with him intimately for some time. For several years I have been in almost daily contact with GEORGE BATES in our labors together, but even a better opportunity was afforded me to learn what he was, on the long trips we have taken together. We have flown literally thousands of miles, across continents and over oceans, visiting strange lands in far-away places, under the most trying conditions. I know the courage and faith he exhibited when we were in perilous positions. The irony of his death is that he should be killed at such a time and place after we had faced greater dangers. My prayer is that the faith that was GEORGE BATES' will help comfort and sustain his loved ones in this hour of irreparable loss.

He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: And whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die.

GEORGE BATES is not dead. He still lives, and the exemplary life that he lived, the faith that was his, the service that he rendered, will always be a source of inspiration to those of us who had the pleasure and good fortune of associating with him.

May God rest his soul, and may the comforting spirit of the Holy Trinity rest upon and abide with his loved ones even unto the perfect day.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HESELTON] be permitted to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, those of us who had the privilege of paying tribute to GEORGE BATES at the requiem mass in Salem can never forget the demonstration of respect and love for him on the part of his close friends and neighbors. Not only was the church crowded but also the streets in the immediate vicinity and thousands more waited patiently along the mile and a half between the church and the cemetery.

As has been so eloquently said here today, all who knew GEORGE respected and admired him. His forthright courage, his intelligent loyalty to his country, his State, and his district, and his intelligent discharge of his responsibilities won for him an outstanding place in the history of this body. We all miss him today and shall continue to miss him. I, too, wish to express in these words my deep sympathy for his wife and his children.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LANE].

CONGRESSMAN GEORGE BATES, WHO DIED IN LINE OF DUTY

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, characteristic of the man is the fact that he modestly devoted only five lines to himself in the Congressional Directory.

This bare and unassuming report fails to give true recognition to the notable record of public service given by GEORGE BATES to his city, his State, and to the Nation.

His 31 years of distinguished stewardship in the executive and legislative branches of government began in 1918 when he was elected to the Massachusetts House of Representatives where he served continuously until 1924. His ability was soon recognized, and it was not long before he became chairman of the committee on municipal finance. His sound grasp of local problems won the endearing respect of the many officials who sought his advice and assistance.

With this excellent preparation, it was logical that he would be summoned to serve as an executive of city government. His fellow citizens elected him as mayor of Salem, Mass., where he made one of the most remarkable records in the history of the State. The esteem in which he was held is evidenced by the fact that he was reelected to that office time and again, over a period of 14 consecutive years. This was largely during the depression when municipalities were challenged by problems such as they will never face again. GEORGE BATES was that happy combination of an efficient and humane administrator. He was able to secure large Federal grants to create work for the unemployed of his community by the soundness of the proposals which he advanced. The number of serviceable and enduring public projects which were constructed during his tenure as mayor will be a monument for many years to come, of his outstanding ability in the field of municipal government. So well did the people think of him that he was returned to office a number of times without any opposition.

In 1936, he was asked to run for Congress, which he did—winning handily. He was in his seventh term when sudden death struck him down.

The late Congressman traveled widely and was a keen student of all phases of the Federal Government. As a member of the important Armed Services Committee in the House, he became an expert on national security.

The United States Navy had no greater advocate than GEORGE BATES. He knew that any plan for unification of the armed forces which would reduce the Navy to a secondary role would be dangerous to the defense of our Nation. He came from a city that was one of the great seaports in the days of our maritime glory. He was reared in an environment that is still rich with the memory of those fabulous sea captains who opened up the vast uncharted reaches of the Pacific to American commerce. A New Englander by birth and by character, he was endowed with its love of the sea, its pioneering spirit, and its hardy realism. Coming from that section of the Nation which is nearest to Europe, he understood the mobile strength of sea power and the major role it must play in our defense. The United States is a world leader with strategic interests all over the globe. GEORGE BATES never lost sight of the elemental fact that most of this earth's surface is covered by water which can be traveled on, above, and below. For this we need a Navy with aircraft, ships, and submarines.

Summoning every resource of his being, he fought to save the Navy. Congress had adjourned, but GEORGE BATES did not give up the fight. He was traveling to the Capital by plane to attend a national defense conference and his "ship" was about to land when his life was claimed by the carelessness of others and the Nation thus lost one of its most diligent and devoted public servants.

His own family served the Navy well in World War II—out on the seas which develop brave men. There was something of its clean and honest strength in GEORGE BATES. He did not ask safety for himself or his own, and, with such sincerity, he did not expect that others would seek privileged comforts in a time of national emergency. GEORGE BATES thought that every man should do his duty. One of the few times when I saw him angry was when some misguided persons sought his influence to have their sons in the Navy transferred to an inland assignment halfway between the Atlantic and the Pacific.

They came to the wrong man but got the right answer.

When GEORGE BATES got through talking with them they were ready for their sons to do sea duty like every other mother's son who got the call, and I am sure that they thank him for restoring their self-respect, wherever they may be today.

His private life was exemplary. He was a man of deep faith who was devoted to his wife and his seven sons and daughters. The love for his family, his country, and his God was the trinity which inspired a life that was rich in its accomplishments.

His home town is only a score of miles away from my own. Many a time I rode down to Washington with him, and so I came to know him as a fine man and as a splendid representative of the people.

It is my earnest hope that this Nation, through the United States Navy, will soon dedicate a lasting memorial to its faithful son who gave up his life in the line of duty—the late Congressman GEORGE JOSEPH BATES, of Salem, Mass.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to our colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER].

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in paying tribute to the memory of GEORGE BATES, one of the Members of the House whose services can never be properly eulogized and properly recorded by what we say here.

GEORGE BATES was one of those rare individuals who commanded the respect and affection of all of his colleagues because of his absolute integrity, both in his public and in his private life. Beginning under the most humble circumstances, he made his mark by being chosen by larger and larger groups to represent them in public affairs. He had great energy, great loyalty and kindliness, and the courage to speak and act in accordance with his convictions whether he knew those convictions to be popular or not.

His tragic death has taken from the House one of the ablest Members it possessed—a man whom I am proud to think of as a close friend. His splendid wife and seven children must feel the deepest satisfaction in the superb record that GEORGE BATES achieved. Our deepest sympathy goes out to them in their personal bereavement and to the Nation in its public bereavement.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to our colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHILBIN].

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I join very sadly with my colleagues in the tribute being paid to Congressman BATES this afternoon by so many friends and colleagues of this House in which he served so honorably and faithfully. We keenly and deeply feel the loss of GEORGE BATES. His tragic passing has saddened all of us.

He was a good, dear, and generous friend. We will not look upon his like again.

He was a courageous and fearless public servant.

He was devoted to his family—a loving father and a devoted husband.

In every sense he was a great American statesman; a great, clean heart, a lively intellect and a noble soul.

Brilliant as were his civic achievements, outstanding his patriotic contributions, commanding his force of personality and courage of conviction, these qualities were all overshadowed by the spirit of deep humility and profound spirituality which seemed to move this great American in his every thought, word, and deed. He was a man of heartfelt, unshakable faith, a man of unflinching loyalty to every cause which he believed just, a man of perseverance and determination in pursuing what he deemed to be right.

He was forceful, but never malicious. He was dynamic, but never unkind. He was persevering, but never ruthless. He was exacting in his standards, but always humane and considerate of others.

I was privileged to serve with him for some time on the great and distinguished Armed Services Committee of this House, which is headed by our beloved and able friend the gentleman from Georgia, the Honorable CARL VINSON, who has just spoken so feelingly and so eloquently his tribute of respect, esteem, and affection for our departed colleague. I came to know GEORGE BATES as an indefatigable worker, tireless in his application, unselfish in his devotion, strong of mind and character, and militant in his attachment to what he thought was best for the Nation. He was a hard hitter, but he never struck below the belt. He was a respected adversary who never bore ill will or animosity to those who opposed him. His kindliness of heart, his sincercity of purpose, his purity of motive, and his generosity of impulse endeared him to all who knew him. He was a true Christian gentleman.

I shall never forget the great demonstration of affection by the people of his home city of Salem upon the sorrowful occasion of his funeral. Thousands of people from the shops and factories, farms and fields, and offices and homes of his district converged upon the beautiful church where the services were held. The military which he loved and served so well, his colleagues who so deeply mourned him, and his own friends among the people, filled the spacious edifice to overflowing. The services were of unusual solemnity and beauty. The eulogy by the beloved, outstanding prelate, one of the great princes of the Catholic Church, Archbishop Cushing, of Boston, was an eloquent and extraordinary tribute to a great but humble and clean-living man whose life was a model of virtue and devotion. And when the services were over and the sorrowful cortege moved slowly through the streets of his beloved city, thousands of people gathered to pay by their presence a last mark of respect for their esteemed civic leader and public servant. The cadence of marching feet, the roll of muffled drums, the soft, muted strains of his favorite religious hymns played by the Marine Band, the long procession winding through the historic streets lined with his own people, the impressive prayers at the spot where his mortal remains were laid—these scenes will be long remembered by those who attended his final rites.

GEORGE BATES has gone from our midst, but his indomitable spirit, noble work, warm friendship, and patriotic example live on as inspiration and encouragement to those who would serve the Nation. GEORGE BATES exemplified the best there is in American public and private life. No tributes which we pay him so sincerely today could possibly measure the worth and nobility of his character and the substance of his contributions. Having known him and served with him has enriched our lives. The Nation is the richer for his life. For his goodness and virtue, he will find rest and peace with our Heavenly Father.

I ask that I may be permitted to include in my remarks a humble tribute which I paid him at the time of his tragic passing and which appeared in the illustrious Boston Post:

REPRESENTATIVE PHILBIN LAUDS BATES—SAYS DEATH OF SOLON REAL LOSS TO NATION

Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN yesterday mourned the air-crash death of Congressman GEORGE J. BATES as a cruel loss to his family, his friends, and the Nation.

In his statement Congressman PHILBIN said:

"I am inexpressibly shocked to learn of the tragic passing of my dear and valued personal friend, Congressman GEORGE J. BATES. Able and conscientious, he was a true and great American. Of strong convictions and determined purpose, he never wavered once he believed he was right. He had a deep sympathy for the underdog.

"His career was an inspiration to young and old alike because he worked and battled his way to high public trust by virtue of his own great natural ability and force of character. Deeply interested in the people of his district and sincerely devoted to promoting the prosperity and welfare of Massachusetts and New England, his broad horizons embraced all State, National, and international questions.

"As my esteemed colleague on the House Armed Services Committee, he rendered invaluable contributions for many years to building up the national defense. He was a believer in a balanced armed system and a staunch loyal friend of the Navy, as well as other services. His views always commanded the great respect of his colleagues. He was not only esteemed but loved, by all who knew him. He was a good, sincere, and profoundly spiritual man vitally and energetically interested in every worth-while cause, active and painstaking in his work, and tremendously devoted to the institutions of our country.

"He has been stricken down at a time when he was at the height of his powers—rich in experience—mature in judgment—with years of usefulness ahead of him. The Nation has lost a stalwart public figure, the people of his district, a faithful servant, his family, a loving father, his colleagues a true and considerate friend, the House, one of our great contemporary Americans.

"I am personally very deeply moved by his untimely death and join prayerfully with his family and many friends in mourning him. GEORGE BATES will long be sorely missed; his achievements long remembered.

"To his devoted wife and lifelong helpmate, Mrs. Bates, and the fine family he leaves behind so sorrowfully afflicted in sudden bereavement, I extend my deepest sympathy. May Almighty God comfort and strengthen them in their hour of sorrow."

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague from Iowa [Mr. CUNNINGHAM].

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, when the news came over the air late in October that GEORGE BATES was the victim of a terrible airplane accident, I was stunned. The people of Des Moines, Iowa, were shocked, and deep sympathy for his family was felt by all of us. He was highly regarded in Iowa. A few years ago he was instrumental in having a cruiser named for the city of Des Moines. He was very sympathetic to all of his colleagues. He was always ready and willing to aid a colleague, no matter how pressing his own affairs. I considered him one of my very best friends in the Congress. Iowa has lost a real friend, and the Nation a great statesman.

I deeply regret his passing. I shall remember him always.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DONOHUE].

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Speaker, I rise reverently to join with the Members of this House in expressing my esteem, respect, and regard for our late colleague, GEORGE BATES.

A state and a nation are only great because of the accomplishments of their citizens. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the United States of America are greater because of the high character of such services as were rendered by our beloved colleague. The finest thing that can be said of any man is that the world is a much better place because he lived. I know we can all sincerely say that about GEORGE BATES. Each of us is the beneficiary of his greatness and his patriotic services.

My deepest sympathy and condolences go out to his family in their bereavement.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I met GEORGE BATES when I first came to Congress but I came to know him intimately in 1947, when I was a member of a committee to which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] referred, which traveled into Europe, the Near East, and around the Mediterranean.

I was one of those who twice had the privilege of appearing before the Pope. On both occasions I was greatly impressed with this simple man who typifies the world roadblock we are trying to erect in the path of a dictator who is bent on accomplishing the disintegration of the American family, the destruction of personal freedom, and the subversion of everything that we call the democratic way of life in the United States of America.

That evening after the audience with the Pope, GEORGE BATES took me aside and told me of the profound impression which an audience with the Pope makes upon a Catholic, and I added on a Protestant also. I had never realized until then that Mr. BATES was a very religious individual. He explained to me how much it meant to a member of that faith to have the privilege of talking to and shaking hands with the head of his church.

GEORGE BATES was one of the kindest men I ever met. You had to know him and live with him on a trip such as we were on to thus understand him. He was always trying to find some way to do something for a friend.

In my opinion, his family life reflects his religious training. He had a large family and a very devoted wife. In my book the most successful thing that a man can do is to have a happy married life and have a family. I consider that a successful husband and father is the acme of American success. He projects his ideas, his ideals, his hopes, and his aspirations, as lived in his life, into the lives of others who will carry on afterward. This is exactly what GEORGE J. BATES did with his life.

Mr. BATES was the kind of legislator that I think makes the American Congress great. Why? Because he studied a problem, and once he found out what he thought was the correct thing to do about it, he did that very thing. He did not measure the political influences. He did not measure any personal success. He wanted to know what was the right answer to the problem, and he talked and acted accordingly.

It was my privilege to sit next to him during this last session of Congress. We had very long, exhaustive hearings on some of the most basic problems in security before the Nation today; upon problems on the solution of which may depend the stability and the peace of the entire world. I found that he worked as hard as or harder than anybody else on our committee. He had an inquisitive mind; he was continually laboring to find out what were the facts and how we should apply the facts to the decisions we had to make. As I said, in my opinion GEORGE BATES was the kind of Congressman that makes the American House of Representatives great; in other words, his actions reflected truly his studied and deliberate conclusions on the great questions that were before the country.

His was a tragic loss; but his family, in my opinion, can find comfort in the fact that in every part of his life he was a true American, he was an excellent father, he was a fine citizen, he was an able legislator. It will be a long time before we have another character like GEORGE J. BATES. As I say, I believe that he typified about the best of everything that I consider worth while in a man, in both private and public life.

I am sorry that I have lost a friend; I am sorry that the Congress has lost such a fine Member; and I extend my heartfelt sympathy to his family at the loss of such a fine husband and father.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague the gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON] and ask unanimous consent that he may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in extending to the family of the late GEORGE J. BATES my deepest and most sincere sympathy.

As a member of the old Naval Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, I was closely associated with GEORGE BATES and knew him well. I do not believe I ever knew a man who was so sincerely interested in the work of his committee and in the security of his country. GEORGE was a tireless worker, he had a highly retentive mind, and he was conscientious to the extreme in everything he did.

The Armed Services Committee will not be the same without him. His district has lost an able Representative and the country has lost a loyal and patriotic public servant.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE].

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I find it impossible to keep silent while men are praising GEORGE BATES. He was a friend of mine. While his district did not quite adjoin mine, it was very close, and the two districts had many problems in common, notably those of the fisheries, in which GEORGE BATES was deeply interested. Indeed the fishermen never had a better friend.

However, I do not propose today to explore GEORGE BATES' legislative record. Others know much more intimately than I the work which he did on the Committee on Armed Services. This was probably his major contribution as a national legislator. I wish simply to speak of the man, of his qualities as a man, of the friendship I felt for him, and of the friendship he gave to me. The death of such a man under such peculiarly tragic circumstances is a great blow to the Congress and to the country. All I can say is that I shall always miss GEORGE BATES, shall always mourn him. I have the utmost sympathy for his bereaved family.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have permission to extend and revise their remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the sudden and untimely death of my very dear friend and colleague, GEORGE J. BATES, was a tragic loss to his State and to the Nation.

His life reflected the great American tradition which makes it possible for one with the humblest start in life to rise to high position by force of character, ability, and industry.

Beginning work at the age of 7 on a part-time basis in a tannery in order to help out at home; ending his formal education with the seventh grade and finding employment as an iron molder; he was destined to serve his fellow citizens 7 years in the Massachusetts House of Representatives, 14 years as mayor of the city of Salem, Mass., and 12 years as a Member of the Congress, with fidelity, ability, and distinction.

Those who served with him in the legislature can testify to his contribution in terms of municipal finance. Those who served with him here know the great part he played as a member of the House Committee on Naval Affairs and the House Committee on Armed Services.

Years of close association in the Congress gave me for him both high regard and deep affection.

Able, experienced, honest, and fearless, he was one of the finest public servants that I have known. He would have made a splendid Governor of his State.

He was a devout Catholic and a devoted father. Seven children survive him, several of whom volunteered for service in World War II. A son-in-law gave his life in that service.

The unparalleled tribute paid to his memory in the city of Salem after his death spoke in eloquent terms of the love and respect in which he was held in his native city.

Store windows throughout the city carried his picture draped in black. The local newspaper, on the day of the funeral services, devoted the entire front page to his photograph and to tributes received throughout the Nation. Thirty thousand people, it was estimated, lined the streets from his humble home to the church and thence to the grave.

Archbishop Richard J. Cushing delivered a beautiful eulogy at the requiem mass which forms a part of our tribute here today.

Far more people, myself among them, knew his merits—

He said—

than knew the man himself.

That is at once the most accurate and most enviable tribute to him.

He added:

That even without knowing him personally many, many thousands knew his high worth and the tremendous good he did.

I shall miss him more than I can say.

I know that the heartfelt sympathy of all who served with him here in this House goes out today to his widow and to each member of the fine family which he loved so dearly.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HAYS].

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my tribute to the others that have been paid to our beloved friend, the distinguished Member from Massachusetts. Mr. BATES and I were neighbors on the third floor in the west corridor of the Old House Office Building throughout the 7 years that I have been a Member of the House. Ours was a friendship that I shall always cherish, and I have many fine memories of our associations.

I think it was Woodrow Wilson who laid down one test of greatness. It was rather negatively stated, but appropriate for this occasion.

He said:

No man is great who thinks himself so, and no man is even good who does not strive for the comfort and happiness of others.

One of the elements of greatness in GEORGE BATES was his modesty and certainly one of the outstanding things about him was the vigorous way in which he sought to add to the comfort and the happiness of others. He seemed to derive great pleasure from those activities that were related to the well-being of his people.

He was a man of expansive sympathies, of broad vision, truly a great American, and I am glad to join with my colleagues in praise of his service and his character.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my word of tribute to the life and service of the Honorable George Bates, of Massachusetts. George Bates and I entered Congress in January 1937 and were two of the small band of new Republicans who were elected in 1936. We never organized a club. There were so few of us no formal organization was needed.

During 13 years I have seen the devoted, selfless service of this sturdy American. Sometimes we found ourselves differing in method or approach, but never did we differ on the foundamental aims to be accomplished. He fought so hard, so intensely for whatever he advocated that he impressed everyone with his sincerity and forthrightness of purpose.

Yes, he could flash a smile; he could take a joke, but his first impulse was to take things seriously. One gained the impression that he thought time was short, that he must be about the main business of the day immediately. Perhaps he had that premonition that life would be shortened for him, that death might come prematurely.

Certainly death did come prematurely to this patriotic American, for he was still a man of vigor and endless energy. I am sure that he knew many things he wanted to accomplish but we will have to say he did more for his country than most men who live longer. His death in a needless airplane accident has caused us all to wonder "Why?" but that is a question we cannot answer now. Some day, perhaps, we shall know.

Now we only know that this man's life is remembered for the good he did and the patriotic ardor which drove him on, even when his concept of duty carried him to his death.

THE LATE HONORABLE MARTIN GORSKI

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 411).

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. MARTIN GORSKI, a Representative from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, no one of us will ever understand the fittings of the pattern of life. A year ago from the State of Illinois came to this House 12 Democratic Congressmen. We have returned at the opening of the second session, 11. During the days we have been away grief came to us. As a body, the surviving 11 attended the funeral services of our friend, MARTIN GORSKI, and mourning with us at that church in his district in Chicago were hundreds and hundreds of women and men and children. In their eyes were tears. They had lost a friend.

MARTIN GORSKI was a man. He was a man of strength and simplicity and with a heart that felt for every human being. There was no pretense about MARTIN GORSKI. Seldom was his voice lifted in this Chamber, yet his influence was felt in the Seventy-ninth and the Eightieth and the Eighty-first Congresses tremendously.

To me has been given this sad mission in the absence of our beloved dean, Mr. SABATH, and at the request of our next senior Member from Chicago, Mr. O'BRIEN, and a friend of MARTIN GORSKI who cannot speak at length on account of the grief that is in his heart. He came to this Chamber in the Seventy-ninth Congress with MARTIN GORSKI, a lifelong friend of the same Polish blood extraction. They were close bosom friends. When the gentleman from Illinos [Mr. GORDON] returned from Europe on a mission for his country and at the airport here heard of MARTIN GORSKI's passing, it was a man with a broken heart who returned to the Chicago that both had represented in three Congresses.

MARTIN GORSKI was born in Poland. He was brought to Chicago as a boy of three. He came up the hard way. He was the child of poverty and he remained in this Chamber throughout his life the champion of the oppressed. When in this Chamber the matter of slum clearance was being discussed I watched the play of expression on the face of MARTIN GORSKI. I saw the gleam of happiness in his eyes when that bill to clear the slums and the bill for public housing was passed, because that marked another triumph in the achievements of this immigrant boy who had given his life to making his adopted country a richer and a finer place in which to live.

I cannot speak at greater length because the grief that I feel is filling my eyes with tears and is closing my voice.

I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHESNEY].

Mr. CHESNEY. Mr. Speaker, the people of the Sixth District of Illinois have lost a great statesman and a fine public servant. I, too, have felt the loss of this great friend. I remember when I first came to the Eighty-first Congress I went to MARTIN GORSKI's office to ask him for advice. He told me what problems would be encountered by a Congressman during his first term in office. It was through the able guidance and sage counsel given me by MARTIN GORSKI that I was able to firmly meet my new responsibilities.

MARTIN GORSKI was born in Poland of very poor parents. He came to this country at an early age, and through his diligent efforts he rose to great heights in public life. It is only in the United States that an immigrant who faced persecution and the oppression of human rights would be able to rise to the dignity of being a Representative of a congressional district in his adopted country. The Sixth District of Illinois will miss MARTIN GORSKI. He served his people well. He was efficient and capable. He did not seek personal glory. He seldom spoke in the great halls of this Chamber, but he always served the cause of true democracy. He had friends on both sides of the aisle. He may have differed politically, but his mind and heart were for the salvation of true democratic ideals.

MARTIN GORSKI has gone to the Great Beyond. He is probably today gazing upon this great Chamber and upon his friends with deep satisfaction in the knowledge that his work was well done. The city of Chicago, the great State of Illinois and his district will feel keenly the loss of MARTIN GORSKI, but the ideals which he held uppermost in life and for which he fought will always remain in the hearts of the people of his district.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES].

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in expressing my profound regret at the sudden passing of our beloved colleague, MARTIN GORSKI. To me, MARTIN GORSKI's life epitomizes the great and wonderful tradition that is peculiarly that of our great Nation, the poor immigrant boy who through only hard effort and hard work rose to represent in the halls of this Congress people from all walks of life, the rich as well as the poor, in his district in the city of Chicago.

I came to know MARTIN GORSKI last year when I was elected to this great body. He was a quiet person, yet his genial personality, his kindness, his sympathy, the untold amount of time he took in listening to the problems of one who was confronted with a new way of life, endeared him very much to me. I came to know his great desire to help his fellow man, and the wonderful facets of his personality, which was an inspiration to all of us.

He was simple in his habits. His life was an example for all to follow. He was a true friend. We from the State of Illinois, particularly those in his congressional delegation, will miss him very much.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, my heart was very much saddened on learning of the sudden passing of my close, dear friend and colleague, MARTIN GORSKI. His death has made a deep wound in my heart and is a great loss to his loved ones and many friends. He will be missed by all of us and may Almighty God have mercy on his soul.

Mr. Speaker, the selection of Members of Congress to represent the people of this great Nation is not only a distinctive honor but a tremendous and weighty responsibility that demands the best faculties we can master to cope with national and world-wide problems that especially confront us at this time. MARTIN GORSKI can be classed in this category of man, for his background as a lawyer, a civic-minded leader whose understanding, through his many years of experience, demonstrated his ability to lend a helping hand whenever the opportunity presented itself and his good judgment was necessary. MARTIN was not a man who sought headlines or front-page publicity or sought fame. He was a man that devoted himself diligently, conscientiously, and earnestly in the task with which he was entrusted by his constituents. He never had an unkind thought in his mind. He always was pleasant, courteous, agreeable, and attempted in every way he possibly could to give other Members the benefit of his experience and advice. It is most regrettable that he should pass from us so suddenly and without any warning whatsoever. I know that all the Members of the House join with me in conveying to the people of his district our appreciation that they sent him to this body to serve them and our country during the trying years he was a Member. They have sustained a great loss, the State of Illinois has sustained a great loss, and our beloved country has sustained a great loss. Every one of us, particularly I, who knew him for his sterling character and remarkable personality, has sustained a personal loss.

He was brought to this country from Poland at an early age; learned our American ways in our parochial schools in Chicago, and sought higher education, through his own efforts, bearing in mind the need of helping his fellow man who asked for guidance and advice. He has left a splendid background of his progress, showing through perseverance and hard work, what can actually be accomplished through one's own unselfish endeavors.

Before coming to Congress in 1942, MARTIN was an assistant State prosecutor, later he became a master of chancery of the city of Chicago, where he served the people with honesty, integrity, an open mind at all times.

The only regret I have is that it was not my privilege to be in this country at the time of his passing to pay my beloved respects to my close friend. Through our friendship and inseparable companionship in Congress, as we both came here at the same time, we were affectionately called by our many friends of the House "the Chicago twins." The news was given me by my secretary when our plane landed at the Washington Airport on December 13 that my "twin" colleague, MARTIN GORSKI, had gone to his last reward. It was a great shock that I can never get over.

He has added through his services here in the House of Representatives another name to that long list of eminent and distinguished Illinoisans who have served the Nation in times of need from the day of its founding down to the present time.

May God be gracious to his family and to the people whom he served.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LANE].

MARTIN GORSKI: REPRESENTATIVE AMERICAN

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, he came from a great city, deep in the heart of the United States, a city where many different races come together and learn the American way of enterprise and good fellowship, far removed from the ancient fears and suspicions that inhibit the people of the Old World.

Chicago is a big city—energetic, bold, and still rough in spots. It is a live city, the nerve center of a railroad system which links the Atlantic with the Pacific and brings to it the riches of a continent to be manufactured into the comforts and conveniences of modern life. From this pulsating and diversified city come typical Americans who are willing to tackle any problem no matter how complex. From the Great Lakes and the Great Plains that meet at Chicago is born the vision and adventuresome spirit of leadership.

MARTIN GORSKI was one of its finest products. He brought the sturdy qualities of diligence and faith to his work as a Representative in Congress from the Fourth Illinois District.

Some observers, on seeing the United States for the first time, are impressed by the massive size and sinews of the things we build. More penetrating students, seeking the reason for these achievements, discern the men who really make America.

And the secret of this miracle is that we offer the most encouraging environment to all who live here, providing that freedom of opportunity which is like the sun and the air and the rain that nourish man's spirit and his energies.

What the United States offers, men of ability and character repay with the joy of fulfillment.

MARTIN GORSKI was such a man.

He was born in Poland. His parents brought him to the New World at an early age. He took root and he flourished in the bustling metropolis of Chicago where he lived in the same district for over 50 years. Through grammar and high school, business college, and law school, he learned not only the technique for earning a living in the service of an honorable profession. To him came the ever-expanding knowledge of his fellow men, partners with him in the enthusiastic job of building a better society.

He served as their Representative in the Congress from 1942 until 1949 where I came to know him well as a colleague on the Judiciary Committee. I was impressed with his great love for the country of his adoption. He did not take it for granted as some of our native-born do. In him was the profound belief that only in a free community can men resolve their differences with justice and decency as they move through this brief life toward their immortal goal.

His personal faith in the greater meaning of life's journey was a living reality that guided his consideration of every legislative issue. He was not a self-seeker because he gave service far greater in return than the honors which came to him. Behind the external necessities to which every man in public life must accommodate himself, was an integrity that was unimpeachable. He knew the law, he served it, and he loved the principles which guide it in its finest expression.

His next of kin have suffered an irretrievable loss and to them we extend our tender consolation. When the shock of grief is mellowed by time, may they treasure the memory of his accomplishments and take heart from the fact that his life on this earth has earned him eternal happiness.

The neighborhood in which he grew up and which sent him as its most distinguished son to represent it at Washington, will mourn him for a long time to come. His example will serve as an inspiration to the man or woman who is chosen to fill the seat which he left vacant in answer to a higher call.

We in Washington will miss this able and highly respected colleague. We learned much from him and this most of all: The high standard of duty to which he dedicated the years of his life.

In the great and growing tradition of those who have served in the Congress, and by their contributions have proved the wisdom of representative government, MARTIN GORSKI will be remembered as a true servant of the people.

It was my privilege to know him as a friend who shared the hope and confidence of his boundless human heart.

Like so many others I am indebted to the memory of a real American: MARTIN GORSKI.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PRIEST].

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I arise at this time to pay a very brief but sincere tribute to the memory of MARTIN GORSKI. It was my pleasure to have been associated with him, at times rather closely, during the time he served as a Member of the House of Representatives.

He would come over frequently to have lunch before the time for the House to begin its daily session.

That has been a part of my routine when possible so that I could have lunch out of the way before the session of the House started.

On many such occasions it was my privilege to have lunch in the restaurant with MARTIN GORSKI. I came to know how the man thought and felt. Just a few days before his death I was in the great city of Chicago to address a luncheon meeting. MARTIN GORSKI was present on that occasion. Again, I was impressed by the genuineness and the warmth of his great friendship. As I think of him today, I think of some lines that Henry Van Dyke wrote, which might well be considered as the measure of a man, and I think how modest, hard-working, and unassuming MARTIN GORSKI, with his very fine sentiment and spirit, has measured up to those tests which Van Dyke set forth in the lines he wrote quite a number of years ago when he said:

Four things a man must learn to do,
If he would write his record true;
To think without confusion, clearly;
To love his fellowman sincerely;
To act from honest motives purely;
To trust in God's help securely.

I shall greatly miss the presence in this Chamber of MARTIN GORSKI, a devoted public servant and a true and understanding friend.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker—

Friends are in life's exchange
True tender for all the rarest forms of joy;
The only pauper is the friendless man.

The eulogies in these memorial services make it crystal clear that, measured by this standard, MARTIN GORSKI was a wealthy man. Those who have spoken have correctly portrayed the life and character of this kindly, efficient, and worth-while legislator.

It was my privilege to serve on the Judiciary Committee and its Bankruptcy Subcommittee with Mr. GORSKI. To know him was not only to respect and admire him, but to love him. He was one of those rare men who, if he could not say good of his colleagues, said nothing. I am not familiar with his education or his background before he entered the House, but I do know that he had a splendid mind, that he was a good lawyer, and that he was one of those optimists who saw the doughnut rather than the hole in the doughnut.

Many a law on the statute books is a better law because MARTIN GORSKI helped write it. We shall all miss him and this is especially true of the Committee on the Judiciary of which he was such an outstanding member. My sympathy goes out to his immediate family and his close friends.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have the privilege of revising and extending their remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DEANE). Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, we all mourn the death of Congressman MARTIN GORSKI, of Illinois. Whatever tribute I may pay him would be as much a tribute to a man and citizen of Chicago and Illinois as it would be to a Member of Congress. I had the pleasure of knowing Congressman GORSKI and knowing him personally, long before he became a Member of the House of Representatives. He was a highly respected citizen of Chicago and the State of Illinois, and ever a friend of the people. He was loyal and kind to his personal friends and held their loyalty during the years I knew him, and he held their respect as well.

In the Halls of Congress, Representative GORSKI voted his convictions without regard to the popularity of his position. He had a keen judicial mind, a sense of justice, an innate endowment of statesmanship. The people of Chicago paid their highest tribute to Congressman GORSKI in life, by electing him to Congress four consecutive terms, and he will live in the hearts of his friends.

Mr. BUCKLEY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, when word came to me of the sudden death of my good friend, MARTIN GORSKI, I was stunned. During my association with him I had always found him to be a man of excellent character, most congenial, and possessed of considerable ability. He devoted many years of his life to serving the public and we have all suffered a great loss in his passing—his family, his colleagues, and the people of his district whom he served so faithfully, as well as his host of friends.

I feel it is fitting that we pause at this time in respect to his memory.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, again the hand of fate has taken from our midst a beloved colleague. We, in Chicago, who were privileged to know MARTIN GORSKI throughout the years felt a deep sense of shock upon learning of his untimely passing.

To have known MARTIN GORSKI was to love him. Quiet, unassuming, ever friendly, he worked diligently and unceasingly for the people of his district. He was a man of real ability, courageous, honest, and sincere, and I have always been impressed by the fairness he always displayed and his friendly attitude toward all things.

Mr. GORSKI resided for over 50 years in the district which he so ably represented here. As a lawyer and State's attorney he established an enviable reputation during his early years. Elevated to the post of master in chancery of the Superior Court of Cook County, Ill., he served with distinction for 13 years, when he was elected to the Seventy-eighth Congress in 1942. His passing is a distinct loss to his district, Illinois, and the Nation, and a great personal loss to those of us who knew him and loved him.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, the sudden and untimely death of my dear friend and cherished mentor, MARTIN GORSKI, was a tragic loss to all of us who knew and loved him.

There are many who have known him longer and more intimately than I: they will attest to his laudable public service, his honesty and courage, his unshaken devotion to the principles which he always upheld.

I knew him personally but a year. Yet in this short span of time, while we met daily on this floor and in our offices, I have gained a profound respect and deep affection for this modest and considerate man, to whom the welfare of others was of utmost concern, and who devoted his life to the service of his people.

His character and kindly personality radiated warmth and affection wherever he went, and left an indelible impression on all who came in contact with him. I do not believe that I have ever met a man who was more accommodating and who would go out of his way to render assistance, regardless of political affiliations, not only to the people of his district, but to his colleagues in this body as well, than MARTIN GORSKI. I shall always cherish the memories of our fine associations and of his friendship.

In his death, the people of his district have lost not only a representative of unimpeachable integrity, but also, and primarily, a faithful servant and a friend. His benevolence, charity and kindness have earned him an enviable reward in heaven.

I wish to extend my sincere condolence and sympathy to his family and host of friends, whose consolation must be great in the knowledge that Almighty God has chosen our friend MARTIN among His very own.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GILMER (at the request of Mr. HOBBS), indefinitely, on account of his own illness.

To Mr. THOMPSON (at the request of Mr. KILDAY), for an indefinite period, on account of illness.

To Mr. BLATNIK (at the request of Mr. PRIEST), through January 17, 1950, on account of official business.

To Mr. JONES of Alabama (at the request of Mr. HAYS of Ohio) for an indefinite period, on account of death in the family.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, as a further mark of respect to the memory of our beloved departed colleagues, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, January 4, 1950, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 4, 1950

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, we thank Thee for new years and for new days and for new thoughts of God and for new hopes for a redeemed humanity and a cleansed earth. With the dim lamps of our own devices we cannot find a sure and clear path through the tangled maze of this stricken generation. Awaiting are solemn responsibilities of public welfare, decisions which make our wisdom or our folly affect the daily lives of untold millions. Who among us is sufficient for these things? Our needs of enlightenment are deep and inward. We pray that our personal record may be kept unstained by any word or act unworthy of our best. We ask it in the Redeemer's name. Amen.

ATTENDANCE OF SENATORS

JAMES O. EASTLAND, a Senator from the State of Mississippi, SPESSARD L. HOLLAND, a Senator from the State of Florida, BURNET R. MAYBANK, a Senator from the State of South Carolina, ERNEST W. MCFARLAND, a Senator from the State of Arizona, CLAUDE PEPPER, a Senator from the State of Florida, and ALEXANDER WILEY, a Senator from the State of Wisconsin, appeared in their seats today.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. LUCAS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, January 3, 1950, was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, informed the Senate that a quorum of the House was present and that the House was ready to proceed with business.

The message also informed the Senate that a committee of three Members had been appointed by the Speaker on the part of the House of Representatives to join with the committee on the part of the Senate to notify the President of the United States that a quorum of each House had assembled, and that Congress was ready to receive any communication that he may be pleased to make.

The message announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 150) providing for a joint session of the two Houses at 1 o'clock p. m. today (January 4, 1950) for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President may be pleased to make to them, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message communicated to the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives adopted as a tribute to the memory of Hon. Clyde M. Reed, late a Senator from the State of Kansas.

The message also communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. George J. Bates, late a Representative from the State of Massachusetts, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

The message further communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. Martin Gorski, late a Representative from the State of Illinois, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. LUCAS and Mr. WHERRY advanced in the center aisle, and

Mr. LUCAS said: Mr. President, as a member of the committee appointed on yesterday to notify the President of the United States that the Congress is in session and ready to proceed to business, I wish to report back to the Senate that the committee has performed that duty. The President advised the committee that at 1 o'clock today, in the Hall of the House of Representatives, he will deliver in person his annual message on the state of the Union.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution coming over from the House of Representatives.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 150) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, January 4, 1950, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. LUCAS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Butler	Donnell
Anderson	Chapman	Douglas
Benton	Connally	Downey
Brewster	Cordon	Dworshak
Bricker	Darby	Eastland
Ecton	Kem	Myers
Ellender	Kerr	Neely
Ferguson	Kilgore	O'Conor
Frear	Knowland	O'Mahoney
Fulbright	Langer	Pepper
George	Leahy	Robertson
Gillette	Lehman	Russell
Graham	Lodge	Saltonstall
Green	Long	Schoeppel
Gurney	Lucas	Smith, N. J.
Hayden	McCarran	Sparkman
Hendrickson	McCarthy	Stennis
Hickenlooper	McClellan	Taft
Hill	McFarland	Taylor
Hoey	McKellar	Thomas, Utah
Holland	McMahon	Thye
Humphrey	Magnuson	Tobey
Hunt	Malone	Tydings
Ives	Martin	Watkins
Jenner	Maybank	Wherry
Johnson, Tex.	Millikin	Wiley
Johnston, S. C.	Morse	Williams
Kefauver	Murray	Young

Mr. MYERS. I announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WITHERS] are absent on official business.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] is absent because of a death in his family.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], and the Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

RECESS

Mr. LUCAS. I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12:40 p. m.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 12:40 o'clock p. m.

On the expiration of the recess, the Senate reassembled, and was called to order by the Vice President.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, the time has now arrived for the Senate, under the previous order, to proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives to listen to the address of the President of the United States.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I wonder if the Senator from Illinois will make an announcement with reference to the Senate marching in a body on its return to the Chamber.

Mr. LUCAS. I made that announcement yesterday, but I shall repeat it. I believe it would be the better part of wisdom to march back in a body.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That would be automatic, unless an order to the contrary were entered, because the Senate has to resume its session following the President's message.

The Senate, preceded by the Sergeant at Arms (Joseph C. Duke), the Secretary (Leslie L. Biffle), and the Vice President, proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

ANNUAL ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 389)

The address this day delivered by the President of the United States at the joint meeting of the two Houses of Congress appears on pages 60–64 of the House proceedings as contained in today's RECORD.

TRANSACTION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The Senate having returned to its Chamber, it reassembled at 1 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m., when called to order by the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the rules, 10 minutes remain for the transaction of morning business.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate continue the morning hour until morning business is concluded, in the event that it is not concluded by 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REPORT OF ECONOMIC COOPERATION ADMINISTRATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 416)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States of America:

I am transmitting herewith the Fifth Report of the Economic Cooperation Administration created by the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948, Public Law 472 of the Eightieth Congress, approved April 3, 1948.

The report covers activities under the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948 (title I of Public Law 472, as amended) as well as the programs of economic aid to China under section 12 of Public Law 47, Eighty-first Congress, and to the Republic of Korea under the provisions of the Foreign Aid Appropriation Act of 1949 (Public Law 793, 80th Cong.). There is also included in the appendix a summary of the status of the United States foreign relief program (Public Law 84, 80th Cong.) and the United States foreign aid program (Public Law 389, 80th Cong.).

This report is for the period April 3 through June 30, 1949.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, November 15, 1949.

REPORT ON ASSISTANCE TO GREECE AND TURKEY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

Transmitted herewith is the eighth quarterly report on United States military assistance to Greece and Turkey. This report covers the period from April 1, 1949, to June 30, 1949. Military assistance to Greece and Turkey was inaugurated under the authority of Public Law 75, Eightieth Congress, and was continued under the authority of title III of Public Law 472, Eightieth Congress, known as the Greek-Turkish Assistance Act of 1948. Responsibility for United States assistance in the economic rehabilitation of Greece begun under Public Law 75 was transferred to the Economic Cooperation Administration on July 1, 1948, pursuant to Public Law 472, title I.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

Three joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Armed Services:

"Assembly Joint Resolution 1

"Joint resolution relative to memorializing the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of Naval Operations, and the Congress of the United States, to maintain in operation the San Francisco Naval Shipyard

"Whereas the San Francisco Naval Shipyard, commonly known as Hunters Point Naval Shipyard is a valuable and strategically located shipyard; and

"Whereas the Navy for many years sought deep-water facilities on the San Francisco water front, and when they obtained Hunters Point, spent huge sums of money in developing the shipyard; and

"Whereas the announcement has been made that the Navy contemplates the shutting down of the San Francisco Naval Shipyard in the near future; and

"Whereas the shut-down of the San Francisco Naval Shipyard would result in the unemployment of many thousands of skilled civilian workers in the San Francisco area; and

"Whereas in case of national emergency the shipyard would be of invaluable aid to the preservation and security of the west coast and of the entire United States: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of Naval Operations, and the Congress of the United States are hereby respectfully memorialized and requested to take such steps as may be necessary to maintain the San Francisco Naval Shipyard in operation to the fullest possible extent consistent with national economy; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly be hereby directed to prepare and transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of Naval Operations, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

"Assembly Joint Resolution 3

"Joint resolution relative to memorializing the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of Naval Operations, and the Congress of the United States, to maintain in operation the Long Beach Naval Shipyard

"Whereas the Long Beach Naval Shipyard at Terminal Island is a valuable and strategically located shipyard; and

"Whereas the Navy for many years sought deep-water facilities on the Long Beach water front, and when they obtained the Terminal Island site spent huge sums of money developing the shipyard; and

"Whereas the Long Beach Naval Shipyard bears the reputation of having been the most efficient and economically administered yard of the Nation during the war years, receiving the most coveted Navy E; and

"Whereas the announcement has been made that the Navy contemplates the shutting down of the Long Beach Naval Shipyard in the near future; and

"Whereas the shut-down of the Long Beach Shipyard would result in the unemployment of many thousands of skilled civilian workers in the Long Beach area; and

"Whereas in the case of a national emergency the Long Beach Naval Shipyard would be of invaluable aid to the preservation and security of the west coast and of the entire United States: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of Naval Operations, and the Congress of the United States are hereby respectfully memorialized and requested to take such steps as may be necessary to maintain the Long Beach Naval Shipyard in operation to the fullest possible extent; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly be hereby directed to prepare and transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of Defense, the Chief of Naval Operations, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

"Senate Joint Resolution 4

"Joint resolution relative to the United States Naval Shipyard at Mare Island

"Whereas the Navy Yard, Mare Island, Calif., was established by the illustrious Admiral Farragut, then a Commodore, in the year 1854 at Vallejo, Calif., as the first navy yard on the Pacific coast, and during the past 96 years through war and through peace this navy yard, now known as the United States Naval Shipyard, Mare Island, Vallejo, Calif., has grown in importance and scope to be one of the largest naval shipyards in the United States and in the world; and

"Whereas during the recent war all 27 private shipyards in the San Francisco Bay area were under the complete or partial control, or direction of the then Navy Yard, Mare Island, and all naval activities centered under the Ferry Building at San Francisco, and the annex of Mare Island at Hunters Point, now known as the San Francisco Naval Shipyard, were also under Mare Island direction; and

"Whereas the Congress of the United States recognizing the importance of Mare Island provided by Federal law that San Francisco activities at Hunters Point must be an annex and operated as such to Mare Island, and approximately 60 percent of all naval shipbuilding and repair work on the Pacific Ocean, under the control of the United States, was accomplished at Mare Island or in activities under the control or direction of Mare Island; and

"Whereas proud of this great heritage and responsibility the city of Vallejo supports and works in close harmony with its one large industry, that it may proudly carry on the high traditions of this heritage, and any serious cut in the present level of employees at the Mare Island Naval Shipyard would seriously hamper the traditions, the stability, and the defense of the west coast of the United States and the Orient and would bring disaster and ruin to Mare Island and Vallejo: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of California (jointly), That the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of Naval Operations, and the Congress of the United States are hereby respectfully memorialized and requested to take such steps consistent with national economy as may be necessary to assure that the defenses of the Pacific and west coast areas not be weakened or hampered by reducing the personnel or otherwise impairing the efficiency of United States Naval Shipyard, Mare Island, Vallejo, Calif., which has always been and in the future will be the most important of all west-coast shipyards capable of rendering the type of support to the defenses of the United States which has been so ably rendered in the past; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be hereby directed to prepare and transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of Naval Operations, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

"Assembly Joint Resolution 5

"Joint resolution relative to memorializing Congress to enact legislation providing for the distribution of funds belonging to California Indians

"Whereas there is now on deposit in the United States Treasury an amount of over $6,000,000 belonging to California Indians as a result of an award made by the United States Court of Claims on December 4, 1944; and

"Whereas the distribution of such funds to their rightful owners, the California Indians, would result in a distribution of an amount of approximately $150 to each California Indian; and

"Whereas such distribution would aid in the alleviation of the present great need of California Indians; and

"Whereas this fund cannot be distributed until Congress so provides; and

"Whereas there was pending at the recent session of the Congress of the United States, S. 1354, which would authorize the distribution of such funds to California Indians: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact into law S. 1354 or any other bill or bills which would accomplish the same purpose; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly be hereby directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

"Senate Joint Resolution 1

"Joint resolution relative to memoralizing the President of the United States, the Congress of the United States, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Maritime Commission of the United States, to reduce the tolls of the Panama Canal

"Whereas vessels passing through the Panama Canal are now required to pay tolls which are greatly in excess of the cost of operating and maintaining the Panama Canal and are oppressive and destructive to the intercoastal shipping industry; and

"Whereas such tolls have been a most important factor in reducing the number of privately owned vessels in the intercoastal shipping service from 170 before World War II to 18 at the present time; and

"Whereas this decline in intercoastal merchant shipping has resulted in a corresponding reduction in the volume of cargo handled by all ports on the west coast of the United States with a consequent loss of business and pay rolls by the ports of California, Oregon, and Washington; and

"Whereas a number of chambers of commerce and civic organizations have emphatically urged a reduction of Canal toll rates; and

"Whereas an active and prosperous intercoastal shipping service is vital to national defense and the welfare of the Pacific coast: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California (jointly), That the President of the United States, the Congress of the United States, the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Maritime Commission of the United States are hereby respectfully memorialized and requested to take such steps as may be necessary to reduce Panama Canal tolls to fair and equitable rates which will encourage and stimulate intercoastal shipping; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of the senate be hereby directed to prepare and transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of Defense, the Maritime Commission of the United States, the Chief of Naval Operations, the Congress of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"Assembly Joint Resolution 2

"Joint resolution relative to the designation of the year 1950 as the year for the observance of an American Free Enterprise Centennial

"Whereas the year 1950 will mark a century of great progress in the advance of mechanization in manufacturing and in the production of devices, materials, and services that have provided the highest living standards for human beings, strengthening and enriching the mind and body; and

"Whereas the world's center of this advance has been within the United States of America and has flourished under the American system of government and had its inspiration from the culture, institutions, and political ideals conceived by the founders of this Republic; and

"Whereas this miracle of industrial achievement with its national economy of plenty for all is the exclusive product of the American private-enterprise system and the joint possession and expression of coordinated American labor and management; and

"Whereas in these times of menacing economic onslaughts from within and beyond our borders it becomes vitally important that a Nation-wide reaffirmation and recognition of the superlative service, worth, and American character of the free-enterprise system be enunciated: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the President and Congress of the United States be memorialized to take such steps as may be necessary to designate 1950 as the year for the observance of an American Free Enterprise Centennial; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly be directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

Two joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

"Senate Joint Resolution 5

"Joint resolution relative to hospital facilities for veterans in California

"Whereas there are insufficient beds in Government hospitals for veterans in California as evidenced by waiting lists and by the large number of tubercular and mentally ill veterans now adding to the overcrowded conditions of California State and county hospitals; and

"Whereas the Veterans' Administration has announced plans for a future building program for hospitals to meet this need; and

"Whereas the United States Naval Hospital at Corona, built by the Navy since 1941 at an expenditure of $19,000,000, has been abandoned by the Navy and is now idle but in every way suitable and desirable for the care of veterans by the Veterans' Administration; and

"Whereas the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans, and other ex-service organizations have recommended the Corona Naval Hospital for transfer to the Veterans' Administration: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of California (jointly), That the Veterans' Administration be, and hereby is, requested to take over at once the Corona Naval Hospital as a major veterans' facility for the care of sick and disabled veterans in California; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Congress of the United States is memorialized to bring about the transfer of the Corona Naval Hospital to the Veterans' Administration and to enact any legislation which may be needed for this purpose; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution shall immediately be dispatched by the secretary of the senate to the President of the United States, to the Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, to each Senator and Representative from the State of California, and to the Veterans' Administrator."

"Assembly Joint Resolution 6

"Joint resolution relative to the continuance of payment of nonresident fees by the Veterans' Administration to the Hastings College of Law, San Francisco, Calif.

"Whereas there is in San Francisco, Calif., the Hastings College of Law, which is the law department of the University of California; and

"Whereas the Hastings College of Law, by operating at 300 percent of normal capacity, is contributing greatly to the education and welfare of student veterans; and

"Whereas the attendance of Hastings College of Law has increased from 44 students on May 8, 1945, to 915 students in September 1949; and

"Whereas the growth and development of Hastings College of Law since 1945 has been made possible by payment to its directors of the same Veterans' Administration fees as those which have been paid for the training of students on other campuses of the University of California, including those at Berkeley and Los Angeles; and

"Whereas on November 9, 1949, the Director, Training Facilities Service for Vocational Rehabilitation and Education, ruled that a nonresident fee of $150 per semester may not hereafter be paid by the Veterans' Administration to the Hastings College of Law; and

"Whereas the adoption of such a nonresident fee was approved by the Veterans' Administrator in January 1945 and payment thereof has been made throughout the last 4½ years; and

"Whereas the Director has ruled that payment of the fee may continue to be made for students enrolled at the School of Jurisprudence of the University of California at Berkeley, Calif., and the School of Law of the University of California at Los Angeles, although the combined enrollment of those institutions is approximately one-third of the enrollment at the Hastings College of Law; and

"Whereas the effect of such ruling is to unjustly and arbitrarily penalize the Hastings College of Law, reducing its gross income by more than $100,000 during the academic years 1949–50 and 1950–51; and

"Whereas the enforcement of the ruling will make it necessary for the Hastings College of Law to discontinue its present policy of accepting a number of student veterans far in excess of the normal capacity of its facilities; and

"Whereas the resultant limitation on the number of student veterans who may be accepted for enrollment will seriously interfere with the continued education of the student veterans affected by the ruling: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the President, Vice President, and Congress of the United States, the Director, Training Facilities Service for Vocational Rehabilitation and Education, and Veterans' Administration to take such steps as may be necessary to permit the Veterans' Administration to continue to pay to the Hastings College of Law the nonresidence fees of student veterans enrolled therein; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly be hereby directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, the Director, Training Facilities Service for Vocational Rehabilitation and Education, the Veterans' Administration, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States, and to the appropriate congressional committees."

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii; to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

"House Concurrent Resolution 15

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the Twenty-fifth Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, in special session assembled (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States of America be and it is hereby respectfully requested to give favorable consideration to and to enact into law Senate 2246 entitled "A bill to amend the National Housing Act, as amended, and for other purposes," introduced by the Honorable JOHN J. SPARKMAN, and which is now pending before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency; and be it further

"Resolved, That duly certified copies of this concurrent resolution be forwarded to the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America, and the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

"Senate Joint Resolution 5

"Joint resolution petitioning the President of the United States to name the Territory of Hawaii as an emergency unemployment region and requesting that he order Federal agencies to assign Federal orders to Hawaiian industry, approve Federal public works projects for Hawaii, and maintain the national defense establishments within the Territory at a high level of readiness

"Whereas general economic conditions in the United States have deteriorated to an extent requiring Federal cognizance of the growing unemployment problem; and

"Whereas a combination of deflationary factors, including sharp curtailment in recent months of activities in the Territory of Hawaii by the Army, Navy, and Air Forces, a 4-month tie-up of shipping between the Territory of Hawaii and the Pacific coast late in 1948, and a tie-up of all island ports in the Territory of Hawaii since May 1, 1949, have caused a severe economic decline and an alarming increase in unemployment in the Territory of Hawaii; and

"Whereas on the island of Oahu alone, where the bulk of the population of the Territory of Hawaii resides, there are over 18,000 unemployed persons out of a working population of 136,000 (about 13½ percent of the total); and

"Whereas for the Territory of Hawaii as a whole there are over 25,000 unemployed out of a working population of 200,000 (about 12½ percent of the total); and

"Whereas this economic decline in the Territory of Hawaii is substantially more severe than for the United States as a whole, causing a curtailment of reserves of private business in the Territory; and

"Whereas the Territory's lack of mineral or other extractive natural resources, its distance from markets, and the physical limitations of its productive capacity make adjustment to economic change more difficult than in other areas of more diversified economic activity; and

"Whereas the Federal policy of special action to ameliorate such conditions by a judicious channeling of Federal orders, authorizations for new Federal public works, and maintenance of national defense establishments is being developed in other areas of the United States faced with similar difficulties: Now, therefore,

"Be it enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii:

"SECTION 1. That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to declare the Territory of Hawaii as an emergency unemployment region; direct appropriate Federal agencies and officials to take action to encourage employment in the Territory of Hawaii by channeling Government contracts to Hawaiian firms where possible; direct that any transfers of military installations take advantage of the suitability and strategic location of Hawaii for such installations; and request the Congress of the United States to enact legislation now pending for certain Federal public works projects in the Territory.

"SEC. 2. That a certified copy of this joint resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, the Delegate to Congress from the Territory of Hawaii, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Defense, the Maritime Commission, the Secretary of Labor, the Veterans' Administration, and the Economic Cooperation Administration.

"SEC. 3. This joint resolution shall take effect upon its approval.

"Approved this 4th day of October A. D. 1949.

"INGRAM M. STAINBACK,
"Governor of the Territory of Hawaii."

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

"House Concurrent Resolution 19

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States of America to amend the Hawaiian Organic Act to provide for the contingency of the death of a judge of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Hawaii

"Whereas the Hawaiian Organic Act provides that provision may be made by law for the filling of the place of any justice of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Hawaii in case of his 'disqualification or absence' but grants no such authority in the event of the death of any justice; and

"Whereas the death of the Honorable Albert M. Cristy, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Hawaii, has created the very contingency for which there is no provision in law: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Twenty-fifth Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii in special session assembled (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States of America be and it is hereby respectfully requested to amend the Hawaiian Organic Act by amending the proviso to section 82 thereof to read as follows: 'Provided, however, That in case of the death, disqualification, or absence of any justice thereof, in any cause pending before the court, on the trial and determination of said cause his place shall be filled as provided by law'; and be it further

"Resolved, That duly certified copies of this concurrent resolution be forwarded to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate of the Congress of the United States of America, and the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii."

PROHIBITION OF LIQUOR ADVERTISING—PETITION

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a letter from Mrs. Harry Achee, of Woodward, Okla., transmitting a petition signed by sundry citizens of that city. I present the petition for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures attached.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures, as follows:

To Our Senators and Representatives in Congress:

We respectfully request that you use your influence and vote for the passage of a bill to prohibit the transportation of alcoholic beverage advertising in interstate commerce and the broadcasting of alcoholic beverage advertising over the radio. The most pernicious effect of this advertising is the constant invitation and enticement to drink. The American people spent $9,640,000,000 for alcoholic beverages in 1947 as compared with $7,770,000,000 in 1945. During the same time there was a corresponding increase each year in crime, juvenile delinquency, broken homes, deaths, and injuries due to intoxicated drivers. There is every reason why this waste of money and human values should not be increased but rather greatly decreased.

BUILDING PROGRAM FOR UNITED STATES SOLDIERS' HOME

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by a committee composed of members of the United States Soldiers' Home, Washington, D. C., relating to the building program for the United States Soldiers' Home.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Armed Services and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SOLDIERS' HOME,
Washington, D. C., December 31, 1949.

To the Senators and Representatives of the United States Congress, Washington, D. C.:

We, the members of the United States Soldiers' Home, assembled in mass meeting in Stanley Hall, hereby resolve to protest against the unfair way we are being treated by the Bureau of the Budget, for they have been holding up the building program for the United States Soldiers' Home and we do not see why. We have $36,000,000 in the trust fund of which the Congress of the United States is the custodian and we need new buildings and facilities to accommodate a waiting list of over 400 veterans who have applied for admission to the home. We further desire an investigation to find out just why the appropriations are being held up for the building program of the United States Soldiers' Home.

We further protest the cut in our rations from 74 cents to 61 cents. We see no good reason for this cut since the money comes out of home funds and not out of public funds of the United States and we know that the enlisted men of the Regular Army who pay for our rations do not want the members of the home underfed.

We further state that we know that the Board of Commissioners of the Home has asked for appropriations in their budgets, from 1948 to 1951 inclusive, but to this date nothing has been done owing to the Budget Bureau.

We also urge the passage of the Teague appropriation bill for the relief of United States Soldiers' Home building program.

We further state that we are in urgent need of new buildings and facilities to take care of the needs of the members in the future, and request that appropriations for that purpose be authorized as soon as possible.

DAIRY INDUSTRY OF THE MIDWEST

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Rochester (Minn.) Dairy Cooperative, relating to the dairy industry of the Midwest.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE ROCHESTER DAIRY COOPERATIVE DECEMBER 7, 1949, IN ACCORDANCE WITH MOTION ADOPTED AT ANNUAL MEETING OF PATRONS DECEMBER 3

Whereas the great dairy industry of the Midwest historically, over half a century, has sold the bulk of the products of its dairy farms in other areas, particularly the East; and

Whereas the agricultural welfare of the Midwest is dependent on livestock enterprises, of which dairying is the major project, by virtue of consumption of forage crops, soil conservation, and revenue; and

Whereas the original intent of the law authorizing marketing orders was to correct local fluid milk market abuses and not to discriminate against any dairy farmer; and

Whereas the high prices received in milk sheds under Government-administered order has so stimulated milk production in those areas that huge surpluses above current needs are created; and

Whereas these surpluses have been thrown into channels of trade formerly served by products of the Midwest farms; and

Whereas this distortion of normal marketing procedures has forced the dairy production of the Midwest, which formerly went into commercial channels, to now be diverted to the Government support program, resulting in accumulation of huge stocks of butter, cheese, and nonfat powder in Government possession at the expense of the taxpayers; and

Whereas this forcing of the Midwest on Government support has resulted in the dairy farmer receiving a price considerably less than parity, while at the same time the producer under marketing orders is receiving a price far above parity; and

Whereas this situation definitely discriminates against the Midwest dairy producer and is contrary to public welfare: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the members of the Rochester Dairy Cooperative, located in the States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Iowa, in annual meeting assembled at Rochester, Minn., on December 3, 1949, hereby instruct the board of directors of this cooperative to convey their protests of this dangerous situation to the Members of Congress and the Secretary of Agriculture and other interested parties; and be it further

Resolved, That action be instituted immediately to correct this situation by the elimination of all Federal milk marketing orders or the modification of their administration.

Adopted at Rochester, Minn., this 7th day of December 1949.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS,
ROCHESTER DAIRY COOPERATIVE,
ROBERT H. BADGER,
President.
E. D. GRASKAMP,
Secretary.

THE NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION POLICY

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a resolution adopted by the Iowa Department of Agriculture, relating to the national transportation policy.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution 6

Whereas the farmers of the United States are vitally concerned in the maintenance and preservation of a sound, efficient, and economical national transportation system; and

Whereas freight rates are now at the highest levels in all history, but nevertheless the railroads are, as a whole, not prospering and, unless efficient national transportation service by rail and other means can be maintained, with fair return to the carriers, at lower than the present levels of charges, it is apparent that the country may be heading toward a national transportation crisis which may force the Government to take over the ownership and operation of the railroads; and

Whereas the national transportation policy, as adopted by the Congress of the United States, places responsibility directly on the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate all modes of transportation subject to the Interstate Commerce Act to recognize and preserve the inherent advantages of each; to promote safe, adequate, economical, and efficient service and foster sound economic conditions in transportation and among the several carriers; to encourage the establishment and maintenance of reasonable charges for transportation services without unjust discriminations, undue preferences or advantages, or unfair or destructive competitive practices; to cooperate with the several States and the duly authorized officials thereof; and to encourage fair wages and equitable working conditions—all to the end of developing, coordinating, and preserving a national transportation system by water, highway, and rail, as well as other means, adequate to meet the needs of the commerce of the United States, of the postal service, and of the national defense; and

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission has adopted no methods of developing, coordinating, and preserving a national transportation system as contemplated by the national transportation policy, other than by permitting increases in charges of the railroads to the point of imposing such burdens upon agricultural and other commerce as to diminish the total volume of traffic and freight revenues of the railroads; and

Whereas agriculture, because of its economic importance to the country, has been given recognition in laws governing the membership of Federal boards, such as the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System (see title 12, sec. 241 of the U. S. Code): Be it

Resolved by the National Association of Commissioners, Secretaries, and Directors of Agriculture, That it call to the attention of the President of the United States the need for appointment to the Interstate Commerce Commission of men of the highest qualifications, and particularly the desirability of including on the membership of the Commission at least one member especially qualified to deal with the transportation problems of agriculture.

FEDERAL SAVINGS AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS BRANCHES

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution which I have received from G. V. Markey, secretary-treasurer of the National Association of State Savings, Building and Loan Supervisors. The resolution was adopted at the tenth annual conference of the association which was held in the capital of my State, Madison, Wis. It endorses Senate bill 2006, for facilitating new branches for Federal savings and loan associations which was reported to the Senate on September 30 by the Banking and Currency Committee. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the resolution be printed at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRANCHES OF FEDERAL SAVINGS AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS

Whereas the Committee on Banking and Currency in the United States Senate has favorably reported S. 2006 which, if enacted, will permit a Federal savings and loan association, with the approval of the Home Loan Bank Board, to establish and operate new branches, if such establishment and operation are at the time in conformity with the practice within the State with respect to branches of State building, savings and loan associations; and

Whereas the Committee on Banking and Currency in the House of Representatives is considering a similar bill, H. R. 4710; and

Whereas S. 2006 would place Federal and State savings and loan associations on an equal basis as to branches in every State in the Union: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Association of State Savings, Building and Loan Supervisors endorses S. 2006 and urges its prompt passage by the Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That to expedite completion of this legislation the Committee on Banking and Currency in the House of Representatives be respectfully asked to conform the language of H. R. 4710 to that of S. 2006 as amended, and to report H. R. 4710 favorably as early as may be practicable in the second session of the Eighty-first Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the association be instructed to send copies of this resolution to every United States Senator and to every member of the Committee on Banking and Currency in the House of Representatives.

APPOINTMENT OF MILES D. KENNEDY AS NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE DIRECTOR OF THE AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD the announcement made by national commander of the American Legion, George N. Craig, relating to the appointment of Miles D. Kennedy as national legislative director of the American Legion.

There being no objection, the announcement was ordered to be printed in the body of the RECORD, as follows:

DECEMBER 25, 1949.

KENNEDY SUCCEEDS TAYLOR AS LEGION LEGISLATIVE DIRECTOR

Appointment of Miles D. Kennedy, New York City attorney, as national legislative director of the American Legion, effective January 1, was announced today by Legion National Commander George N. Craig.

Kennedy succeeds John Thomas Taylor, who has reached retirement age after piloting American Legion legislation in Congress for 31 years. Taylor will remain in harness as legislative consultant during the second session of the Eighty-first Congress. Retention of Taylor in a special capacity was authorized by the Legion's national executive committee last month.

In his new post Director Kennedy will work closely with Elmer W. Sherwood, of Indianapolis, Ind., newly appointed chairman of the national legislative commission of the American Legion. Kennedy has been a commission member for 4 years and served as its vice chairman in 1948–49.

Born at Dover Plains, N. Y., Kennedy attended high school at Poughkeepsie and studied law at Fordham University. He received his law degree in June 1922. A practicing attorney in New York City since 1923, he leaves a partnership in the firm of Darcy, Loughman & Bailey to take the Legion assignment.

LONG LEGION RECORD

Kennedy interrupted his education to enlist in the Army for World War I military service. Assigned to the Eighteenth United States Infantry, he later was transferred to the Five Hundred and Fourth Aero Squadron, Aviation Section, Signal Corps. He served as a sergeant until his discharge in December 1918.

Joining the James C. Sullivan Post, No. 75, of the American Legion in New York City, Kennedy served three terms as post commander. He was treasurer and commander of the Bronx County Legion, district commander, and in 1945 department commander of New York. He is also a member of Bronx Voiture 33 of the Forty and Eight.

Married to Agnes McCabe, of Poughkeepsie, January 11, 1924, Kennedy is the father of a daughter, Ann, now 19.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is concluded.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Georgia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I offer for the RECORD at this point the report of the Senate Finance Committee on this bill. It is not a very voluminous report, but it is a very carefully considered report, dealing with all of the amendments offered to the bill which passed the House some time ago and which was considered by the Senate Finance Committee during the first session of this Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The report (No. 309) is as follows:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with amendments and recommend that the bill as amended do pass.

LEGISLATIVE BACKGROUND OF REGULATION OF OLEOMARGARINE THROUGH THE TAXING POWER

The act of August 2, 1886 (24 Stat. 209), defined "butter" and "oleomargarine" and imposed the following taxes on oleomargarine: Manufacturers, $600; wholesalers, $480; retailers, $48; domestic oleomargarine, 2 cents per pound; and imported oleomargarine, 15 cents per pound. This tax statute contained packaging and labeling provisions and, in addition to providing for the forfeiture of unstamped oleomargarine, it provided for the forfeiture of oleomargarine which was adjudged to be deleterious to the public health.

It was clear from its inception that this exercise of the taxing power was primarily designed to achieve certain regulatory effects in the field of competition between oleomargarine and butter. In opening the Senate debate on this 1886 act, Senator Miller said:

"I resort to no subterfuges in this case, Mr. President. My object in bringing forward this bill and supporting it is, not to secure a large increase to the revenue of our Government; but I have sought to invoke the taxing power of the Government in order that under it the Government might take absolute control of this manufacture, might properly regulate it, and so regulate and control it that it should be carried on in a legitimate way and that the product should be sold to the consumer in all cases for what it is, and it is for that purpose that the friends of this measure have invoked the taxing power of the Government" (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 17, 1886, p. 7073).

The present difference in tax treatment between yellow oleomargarine and other oleomargarine was inserted in the law by the act of May 9, 1902 (32 Stat. 193). The purpose of this differential tax treatment was to regulate further the competition of oleomargarine and butter. This act imposed a 10-cents-per-pound tax on oleomargarine artificially colored to look like butter.

By the act of March 4, 1931 (46 Stat. 1549), the 10-cent tax was made to apply to all oleomargarine which met a statutory definition of "yellow," whether or not colored artificially.

REVENUES

Total collections under all of the internal-revenue taxes on oleomargarine have been estimated by the Bureau of the Budget for the fiscal years 1949 and 1950 at $16,000,000 for each year. Actual collections for the first 9 months of the fiscal year 1949 amount to $13,401,608. The following table gives a break-down of the various internal-revenue taxes on oleomargarine for the fiscal years 1947 and 1948:

Internal-revenue taxes on oleomargarine

	Rates, present law	Collections (thousands of dollars) (actual), fiscal years—
		1947	1948
Excise taxes:
Colored oleomargarine	10 cents per pound	2,132	5,290
Uncolored oleomargarine	¼ cent per pound	1,441	2,066
Total excise taxes		3,573	7,356
Special taxes:
Manufacturers	$600 per year	34	23
Wholesale dealers:
Colored oleomargarine	$480 per year	74	132
Uncolored oleomargarine	$200 per year	364	424
Retail dealers:
Colored oleomargarine	$48 per year	224	411
Uncolored oleomargarine	$6 per year	1,604	1,460
Total special taxes		2,301	2,450
Total oleomargarine taxes		5,874	9,806

POWERS OF THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION TO REGULATE COMPETITION BETWEEN OLEOMARGARINE AND BUTTER

Competition between yellow oleomargarine and butter in interstate commerce falls within the scope of the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission to prevent unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices. Section 5 (a) of the Federal Trade Commission Act (title 15; U. S. C., sec. 45 (a)) states:

"Unfair methods of competition in commerce, and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce, are hereby declared unlawful."

Misrepresentation of oleomargarine as butter is prohibited by this section, and in the past the Federal Trade Commission has proceeded against labeling and advertising practices which were deceptive in confusing oleomargarine with butter.

PROTECTION AGAINST ADULTERATION AND MISBRANDING OF OLEOMARGARINE THROUGH THE FOOD, DRUG, AND COSMETIC ACT

The Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act in its present form prohibits the introduction of any adulterated or misbranded food in interstate commerce, and proffered delivery or receipt in interstate commerce of any adulterated or misbranded food.

On the basis of the testimony presented to your committee on this bill there does not appear to be any doubt but that the standards provided by the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (Public Law 717, 75th Cong., 3d sess., June 23, 1939; U. S. C., title 21, sec. 301 et seq.) are adequate to protect against adulterated oleomargarine in interstate commerce.

With respect to the misbranding of food the act prohibits, in section 301 (k), "the alteration, mutilation, destruction, obliteration, or removal of the whole or any part of the labeling of, or the doing of any other act with respect to, a food, drug, device, or cosmetic, if such act is done while such article is held for sale after shipment in interstate commerce and results in such article being misbranded."

The United States Supreme Court held, in U. S. v. Sullivan (332 U. S. 689), with reference to section 301 (k) that—

"The language used by Congress broadly and unqualifiedly prohibits misbranding articles held for sale after shipment in interstate commerce, without regard to how long after the shipment the misbranding occurred, how many intrastate sales had intervened, or who had received the articles at the end of the interstate shipment (332 U. S. 689, 696)."

Under the provisions of the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act the Federal Security Administrator, who is charged with its administration, has assumed jurisdiction over oleomargarine moving in interstate commerce. The administrator has established a standard of identity for oleomargarine in accordance with provisions of section 401 of the act, and oleomargarine in interstate commerce is regulated in accordance with this standard of identity.

EXPLANATION OF PROVISIONS OF THE BILL

The House bill (H. R. 2023) repeals the internal-revenue taxes on oleomargarine and permits the oleomargarine interests to sell their product in harmless colors of their own choice in free competition with butter unhindered by the burden of discriminatory Federal taxation. However, the bill eliminates any possibility that the consumer of table spreads will not know what he is getting. The competition between the two principal table spreads for consumer preference is to be free of confusion as to identity. At the present time oleomargarine which has moved in interstate commerce is required to meet the exacting requirements of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act with respect to labeling. There is little danger that the consumer of interstate oleomargarine will be confused as to the product he obtains. There remain however two principal levels at which confusion of identity may occur: One is at the restaurant level where the applicability of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act is uncertain, and the other exists with respect to oleomargarine produced and sold in the same State. The House bill (H. R. 2023) brings the regulation of colored oleomargarine squarely within the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, irrespective of the source of the oleomargarine, and specifically regulates the restaurant transaction of serving colored oleomargarine. Thus, intrastate colored oleomargarine would be held to the same standards respecting purity and labeling as colored oleomargarine which is shipped in interstate channels.

Of perhaps even greater importance than the elimination of the possibility for confusion of identity between colored oleomargarine and butter, the bill makes possible the effective regulation of colored oleomargarine and butter moving in interstate channels.

Oleomargarine is not dependent upon local supply of raw materials as is butter, which depends upon an adequate supply of fluid milk and cream, and it would be entirely feasible and practicable to establish manufactories in each of the several States to avoid the effects of the Federal law. It is clear that close regulation of colored oleomargarine from interstate producers, while oleomargarine of local production is left free of control, would in practical effect give local producers a great competitive advantage. The substitute for butter or sale as butter of colored oleomargarine not clearly identified as such, or which is otherwise adulterated or misbranded, would not only depress the interstate market in butter but would also bring colored oleomargarine which fully complies with Federal regulation into disrepute and depress the interstate market for it.

Without regulation of colored oleomargarine from all sources there cannot be effective regulation of that part of the colored oleomargarine which comes from out-of-State sources. As a matter of enforcement it would be difficult, and in some cases impossible, to prove that colored oleomargarine substituted or sold for butter had been previously in interstate commerce. The regulation of the whole is necessary in order to provide effective regulation of that part which originates from outside the State of consumption.

The regulation by Congress under the commerce power of purely intrastate transactions is constitutionally permissible if such regulation is reasonably necessary to protect interstate commerce and to make its regulation effective.

Following the Shreveport Rate cases (234 U. S. 342), in which it was held that railroad rates of an admittedly intrastate character and fixed by authority of the State might still be revised by the Federal Government because of the economic effects which they had upon interstate commerce, the Supreme Court has frequently sustained Federal regulations under the commerce power when applied to intrastate transactions (Mulford v. Smith, 307 U. S. 38; United States v. Darby, 312 U. S. 100; Currin v. Wallace, 306 U. S. 1; United States v. Wrightwood Dairy Co., 315 U. S. 110; Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U. S. 102).

In United States v. Wrightwood Dairy Co., supra (1942), the issue was raised as to whether a Chicago milk dealer who purchased milk within the State and sold it locally could be properly subjected to the provisions of the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act of 1937 for the purpose of setting minimum prices. The Court in upholding this exertion of the Federal power states:

"The national power to regulate the price of milk moving interstate into the Chicago, Ill., marketing area extends to such control over intrastate transactions as is necessary and appropriate to make the regulation of the interstate commerce effective; and that it includes authority to make like regulations for the marketing of intrastate milk whose sale and competition with interstate milk affects its price structure so as in turn to affect adversely the congressional regulation" (p. 121).

In defining the scope of the commerce power the Court had this to say:

"The commerce power is not confined in its exercise to the regulation of commerce among the States. It extends to those activities intrastate which so affect interstate commerce or the exertion of the power of Congress over it, as to make regulation of them appropriate means to the attainment of a legitimate end, the effective execution of the granted power to regulate interstate commerce" (p. 119).

TECHNICAL PROVISIONS OF THE BILL WITH EXPLANATION OF THE COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS

The first section of the bill (H. R. 2023) repeals section 2301 of the Internal Revenue Code, which sets the rate of tax on oleomargarine at one-fourth cent per pound and at 10 cents per pound if yellow in color, declares by whom and how the tax shall be paid, and the manner of assessment.

Section 2 repeals the occupational taxes on oleomargarine manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers and provides that such repeal shall not entitle any manufacturer, wholesaler, or retailer to a refund of any occupational tax heretofore paid.

The committee makes no amendments to the first two sections of the bill.

Section 3 (a) comprises a declaration and finding that the sale, or the serving in public eating places, of colored oleomargarine or colored margarine without clear identification as such, or which is otherwise adulterated or misbranded, burdens interstate commerce by depressing the market for butter and for oleomargarine or margarine which is clearly identified and which is neither adulterated nor misbranded. This burden exists irrespective of whether such oleomargarine originates from an interstate source or from the State or Territory in which it is sold. The committee makes no amendment to the declaration and finding contained in this subsection.

Section 3 (b) amends section 301 of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act by adding a new paragraph thereto which prohibits the serving of colored oleomargarine or colored margarine in violation of the new section 407 (b) of such act. Section 407 (b) regulates not only the public eating place transaction of serving colored oleomargarine or colored margarine but also places certain requirements upon public eating places which possess colored oleomargarine or colored margarine in a form ready for serving. A violation therefore can occur without an actual serving if the public eating place has in its possession colored oleomargarine or colored margarine in a form ready for serving without complying with the provisions of 407 (b). The committee amendment to section 3 (b) clarifies this point and brings the amendment made in section 3 (b) in line with the new section 407 (b) of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act. Paragraph (m) of section 301 of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act without the committee amendment reads as follows:

"(m) The serving of colored oleomargarine or colored margarine in violation of section 407 (b)."

With the committee amendment it will read:

"(m) The serving or the possessing in a form ready for serving of colored oleomargarine or colored margarine in violation of section 407 (b)."

Section 3 (c) amends chapter IV of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act by adding thereto a new section (sec. 407). Subsection (a) of section 407 subjects colored oleomargarine or colored margarine which is sold in the same State or Territory in which it is produced to the same controls under the act as if it had been introduced in interstate commerce. Thus, intrastate oleomargarine or margarine, if it is colored as defined in 407 (d), will be held to the same standards respecting labeling and purity as colored oleomargarine or colored margarine which is shipped in interstate channels. The committee makes no amendments to this subsection.

Subsection (b) of section 407 specifically regulates the use of colored oleomargarine or colored margarine by public eating places. Subsection (b), as it passed the House, appears to require persons who possess colored oleomargarine or colored margarine in a form ready for serving at public eating places to (1) post a notice that oleomargarine or margarine is served in a prominent and conspicuous place in the establishment, or (2) to place such a notice on the menu in type or lettering not smaller than that normally used to designate other food items, or (3) to keep such oleomargarine or margarine only in a form which is molded and shaped so as to have three sides (exclusive of the ends). Subsection (b) of section 407 would appear further to require that persons who serve colored oleomargarine or margarine at a public eating place (1) cause each separate serving thereof to bear labeling, or to be accompanied by labeling, identifying it as oleomargarine or margarine, or (2) cause each separate serving thereof to be triangular in shape.

The committee feels that subsection (b) in the form in which it passed the House is somewhat ambiguous. Although the foregoing would appear to be what the language of the subsection says, other interpretations are possible and have been offered. The committee amendment seeks therefore to clarify subsection (b), to make its terms explicit, and eliminate the possibility for misinterpretation and confusion. Since the requirements of 407 (b) are enforceable by criminal actions as well as suits for injunction (secs. 302 and 303, Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act), it is very essential that the language of this subsection be clear and unmistakable.

Subsection (b) as amended by your committee requires persons who possess colored oleomargarine or colored margarine in a form ready for serving at public eating places to (1) post a notice that oleomargarine or margarine is served in a prominent and conspicuous place in the establishment, or (2) place such a notice on the menu in type or lettering not smaller than that normally used to designate other food items. Persons who shall serve colored oleomargarine or colored margarine at a public eating place are required to (1) cause each separate serving thereof to bear labeling, or to be accompanied by labeling, identifying it as oleomargarine or margarine, or (2) cause each separate serving thereof to be triangular in shape.

Subsection (c) of section 407 exempts colored oleomargarine or margarine from most of the labeling requirements of section 403 of the act at the time of service at public eating places, provided compliance is had with the requirements of subsection (b) discussed above. Exception is made of section 403 (a) and 403 (f). By section 403 (a) a food becomes misbranded if its labeling is false or misleading in any particular. Section 403 (f) specifies that identifying marks shall be prominently placed on the food "with such conspicuousness (as compared with other words, statements, designs, or devices, in the labeling) and in such terms as to render it likely to be read and understood by the ordinary individual under customary conditions of purchase and use."

These provisions would require that the word "oleomargarine" or "margarine" appear in some contrasting color either on the receptacle, or on a wrapping, or on a slip placed upon the individual pat or serving. The requirement that each separate serving bears labeling identifying it as oleomargarine or margarine is not met by imprinting the word oleomargarine or margarine on the individual pat constituting the serving. The yellow color makes it difficult to read the imprint and such pats tend to melt at room temperature. The committee makes no amendment to this subsection.

Subsection (d) of section 407 defines colored oleomargarine or colored margarine.

The definition is drawn from the Oleomargarine Tax Act. If it is any color other than one within the defined ranges, the provisions of the amendment will not apply. The committee makes no amendment to this subsection.

Section 4 of the bill provides for the transfer of funds available for enforcement of the Oleomargarine Tax Act to the Food and Drug Administration. These funds will be made available to that Administration in an amount determined to be proper by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget. There is to be no lapse of time between repeal of the tax statute and enforcement of the controls provided in the amended Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act. The committee makes no amendment to this section.

Section 5 of the bill, as it passed the House, declares that "this act shall not abrogate or nullify any statute of any State or Territory now in effect or which may hereafter be enacted."

The committee feels that as a matter of policy this section seeks to and should accord to the various States and Territories the right to ban the possession, sale, or serving of colored oleomargarine or colored margarine, or to place upon its use or sale additional requirements not in conflict with the Federal law. The language of section 5, however, as it passed the House is sufficiently broad to permit a State or Territory to circumvent the Federal law entirely and to permit the completely unregulated use and sale of colored oleomargarine or colored margarine within its jurisdiction. To permit this would defeat the policy and purpose upon which the Federal regulation is predicated. The committee amends section 5, therefore, to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. Nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the possession, sale, or serving of colored oleomargarine or colored margarine in any State or Territory in contravention of the laws of such State or Territory."

The committee feels that section 5, as amended, reserves to the States and Territories the power to regulate colored oleomargarine or colored margarine in harmony with the Federal law but does not grant to the States and Territories the power to destroy the effectiveness of the Federal law which is designed to provide a minimum of protection to consumers of butter and colored oleomargarine, and to assure honesty, fair dealing, and an absence of all deception in the competitive sale of such products.

The committee amendment to section 6 of the bill makes the act effective on July 1, 1949. The provisions of section 6 as it passed the House made the repeal of the special occupational taxes on manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers of oleomargarine effective 30 days after enactment, or July 1, 1949, which ever date is earlier, and denies refund of taxes previously paid. This might produce inequitable results. The special-tax year commences July 1, and the tax is due for the whole year in case of one in business during the month of July, and for the balance of the year in case of one commencing business after the month of July. Therefore, if the special taxes should be repealed as of June 1, 1949, a person who prior thereto paid the tax for the current special-tax year ending June 30, 1949, will have paid a tax (which is not refundable) for the month of June; whereas a person commencing business in June would not incur any special-tax liability for the remainder of the current special-tax year. In order to avoid this type of inequity the committee feels that the act should have one effective date and that it should be July 1, 1949.

In the opinion of your committee the bill (H. R. 2023), as amended, is in the public interest and should be enacted without delay.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, at this time I offer in the nature of a substitute for H. R. 2023, an amendment on which appear the names of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WITHERS], the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR], the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY], the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], the Senator from Montana [Mr. ECTON], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER], the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute submitted by Mr. WILEY for himself and other Senators is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"DEFINITIONS

"SECTION 1. (a) The term 'oleomargarine' as used in this act includes—

"(1) all substances, mixtures, and compounds, known as oleomargarine, margarine, oleo, or butterine;

"(2) all substances, mixtures, and compounds which have a consistency similar to that of butter and which contain any edible oils or fats other than milk fat if (A) made in imitation or semblance of butter, or purporting to be butter or a butter substitute, or (B) commonly used, or intended for common use, in place of or as a substitute for butter, or (C) churned, emulsified, or mixed in cream, milk, skim milk, buttermilk, water, or other liquid and containing moisture in excess of 1 percent and commonly used, or suitable for common use, as a substitute for butter.

"(b) For the purposes of this act, 'yellow oleomargarine' is oleomargarine, as defined in subsection (a) of this section, having a tint or shade containing more than one and six-tenths degrees of yellow, or of yellow and red collectively, measured in terms of the Lovibond tintometer scale read under conditions substantially similar to those established by the Bureau of Internal Revenue, or the equivalent of such measurement.

"(c) The term 'commerce' as used in this act, means trade, traffic, commerce, transportation, or communication among the several States, or between the District of Columbia or any Territory of the United States and any State or other Territory or between any foreign country and any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or within the District of Columbia or any Territory, or between points in the same State but through any other State or any Territory or the District of Columbia or any foreign country.

"PROHIBITED ACTS

"SEC. 2. The manufacture, transportation, handling, possession, sale, use, or serving of yellow oleomargarine in commerce, or after shipment in commerce as yellow oleomargarine, or in connection with the production of yellow oleomargarine for shipment in commerce, is hereby declared unlawful: Provided, however, That yellow oleomargarine manufactured or colored within the borders of a State or Territory in which it is to be consumed shall not be subject to the provisions of this act but shall be subject to the laws and regulations of such State or Territory. Nothing contained in this act shall be construed to limit in any way the applicability of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act.

"ENFORCEMENT

"SEC. 3. The Administrator of the Federal Security Agency is authorized and directed to administer and enforce this act and to prescribe and enforce rules and regulations to carry out its purposes and policies. The enforcement provisions of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, including the provisions relating to injunctions and seizure, shall be available for the enforcement of this act.

"PENALTIES

"SEC. 4. Any person, firm, or corporation violating any of the provisions of this act, or of the rules and regulations issued in connection therewith, and any officer, agent, or employee thereof who directs or knowingly permits such violations, or who aids or assists therein, shall upon conviction thereof be subject to punishment in the same manner and to the same extent as persons who violate the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act.

"APPROPRIATIONS

"SEC. 5. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary for the adequate enforcement of this act.

"REPEAL

"SEC. 6. The following sections of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to taxes on colored and uncolored oleomargarine, to special occupational taxes on manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers of oleomargarine, and to packaging, reporting, and other regulations of oleomargarine) are hereby repealed: Sections 2300, 2301, 2302, 2303, 2304, 2305, 2306, 2307, 2308, 2309, 2310, 2311, 2313, 3200, 3201, (26 U. S. C., secs. 2300, 2301, 2302, 2303, 2304, 2305, 2306, 2307, 2308, 2309, 2310, 2311, 2313, 3200, 3201)."

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], who is one of the proponents of the measure, will now address the Senate.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, the bill before the Senate is House bill 2023, which passed the House during the first session of the Eighty-first Congress by a vote of 287 to 89. I may say that a very similar bill was approved by the House of Representatives in the second session of the Eightieth Congress by a vote of 260 to 106.

The measure was unanimously reported by the Senate Finance Committee on April 28, 1949, with the recommendation that "in the opinion of your committee the bill, H. R. 2023, as amended, is in the public interest and should be enacted without delay," and has been pending on the Senate Calendar since that time. Late in the last session the Democratic policy committee voted unanimously to make this bill the first order of business in this session.

In response to that decision, the able senior Senator from Georga [Mr. GEORGE] has called up House bill 2023, and I wish to thank him for his action.

The time has come for the Senate to express itself on this matter. The House not only passed this bill by an overwhelming vote in the last session but approved a similar bill during the last session of the Eightieth Congress. The Senate Finance Committee reported that measure in late May 1948, but the Senate did not vote on the bill.

I should like to describe briefly the provisions of House bill 2023. It is a bill which repeals the Federal antimargarine laws that have existed in one form or another for more than 60 years. Specifically, House bill 2023 would repeal Federal taxes imposed on margarine annually as follows: Retailers handling colored margarine, $48, uncolored margarine, $6; wholesalers handling colored margarine, $480, uncolored margarine, $200; a 10-cent-a-pound tax on colored margarine, a tax of one-fourth cent a pound on uncolored margarine, and a tax on manufacturers of $600.

The measure also provides that a public eating place serving yellow margarine must post a notice to that effect, or print such a notice on the menu. In addition, each separate serving of yellow margarine must be identified as such when it is served, or, as an alternative, it must be served in a triangular shape. Violation of this provision is a Federal offense, and enforcement is in the hands of the Federal Food and Drug Administration.

On that point I wish to quote one paragraph from page 3 of the report, as follows:

> On the basis of the testimony presented to your committee on this bill there does not appear to be any doubt but that the standards provided by the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (Public Law 717, 75th Cong., 3d sess., June 23, 1939; U. S. C., title 21, sec. 301, et seq.) are adequate to protect against adulterated oleomargarine in interstate commerce.

The bill reported by the Senate Finance Committee is almost identical with that approved by the House on April 1, 1949; the differences result from a committee amendment which changes the effective date, and from three minor clarifying amendments.

Before discussing the issues involved in this matter, I should like to remind the Senate that repeal of the Federal antimargarine laws was a plank in the 1948 Democratic platform. The President has said that he will sign a repeal bill if he has the opportunity.

Mr. President, the question of repealing the antimargarine laws has been talked about a great deal during the past few years. Many of my colleagues are familiar with the arguments for eliminating the taxes and restrictions, as well as the arguments for their retention.

Margarine today is a perfectly good food product, whose nutritive value is fully equal to that of butter.

In this connection, I refer the Senate to studies and reports by the New York Academy of Medicine, by the Food and Nutrition Board of the National Research Council, and by Dr. Harry Leichenger, Dr. George Eisenberg, and Dr. Anton J. Carlson, of the University of Illinois College of Medicine. Those reports are contained in the hearings.

The principal ingredients of margarine are domestic fats and oils, cottonseed and soybean oils being used for the most part, although some peanut and corn oil also are utilized. About 16 percent of margarine is pasteurized, cultured skim milk, and over 99 percent of all margarine is fortified with 15,000 units of vitamin A.

The only basic difference between margarine and butter is that margarine is vegetable fat and butter an animal-fat product.

Margarine competes with butter and has sold, on the average over the years, for about half the price of butter. This competition was the reason for the enactment of the first Federal antimargarine laws, and is the reason why there is strong opposition today to repeal.

The first Federal antimargarine law was imposed in 1886, years before there was any protective pure-food Federal legislation. At the time margarine was made primarily from oleo fat and beef or animal fat. No Federal standard of identity for margarine had been established, and margarine and many other foods were inferior to the present-day products.

Significantly, the issues of color and fraud, now primary concerns with those fighting margarine, were almost ignored in the 1886 debates. The law enacted then imposed a tax of 2 cents a pound on all margarine, both white and yellow. Senator Miller, of New York, one of the principal proponents of the bill, frankly described the purpose of that first measure. He said on the Senate floor:

> I want no money from this bill in the Treasury. I want protection to the dairy industry of New York. I want it to go so far as to exterminate the rival industry, if necessary.

After the passage of that first punitive bill, it seemed for a time that margarine had been put out of existence. Production dropped sharply at first, only to rise again. The foes of margarine decided they had their work to do all over again.

The second Federal antimargarine bill was enacted in 1902. It reduced the tax on white margarine to one-fourth cent a pound and raised the tax on colored margarine to 10 cents a pound. As I have stated, there was little or no reference to color, or fraud, in the 1886 discussions. In 1902 margarine's opponents stressed the color and fraud angles.

However, Representative John Sharp Williams, who later became Senator from Mississippi, quoted the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as saying that even in those days, before pure-food legislation, very little margarine was sold as butter. Representative Williams charged that the aim of the legislation was to destroy margarine.

After 1902 margarine sales dropped, only to increase once more. Furthermore, margarine manufacturers developed a process for making naturally colored margarine by using palm oil and some beef fat. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue ruled in 1929 that margarine made with these natural oils could be sold without the payment of the 10-cent tax.

The butter forces tried once more. In 1931 the 1902 act was amended by placing a tax of 10 cents a pound on all colored margarine, whether naturally or artificially colored. I wish to emphasize the point that the act of 1931 prohibited the making of naturally colored margarine, that is, margarine which got its color from the natural color of the ingredients. Colored margarine was described as margarine having a tint or shade containing more than 1.6° of yellow, or yellow and red collectively. In 1931 considerable quantities of imported fats and oils were used in margarine, but today the product is made almost exclusively from domestic fats and oils.

I have sketched this history of the antimargarine acts in an effort to substantiate my belief that the real aim of antimargarine legislation is to destroy, if possible, the margarine industry and, if that object could not be achieved, to cripple it as much as possible. As late as June 18, 1941, the Dairy Record, which represents the dairy industry, said:

> The dairy industry must set as its goal the complete extermination of margarine. It must never rest until the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine has been outlawed in this country.

The butter industry has shifted its arguments to meet changing situations, and has shifted them again only recently. Always, however, these arguments plead for legislative discrimination against margarine. The butter industry does not want to compete fairly and squarely in the market place, and has used the Congress and the State legislatures to prevent that competition.

The butter industry claims that repeal of the antimargarine laws would ruin, or injure gravely, the dairy industry. This is the crux of butter's case, and undoubtedly will be stressed over and over again during this debate.

I do not believe that repeal will injure the dairy industry, much less destroy it. There is not even proof that repeal will do any great amount of damage to butter. Regardless of that question, however, any industry is on very shaky ground when it asks the Congress for legislation aimed at a domestic competitor because it fears damage from competition. There should be some weighty and urgent reasons indeed if we enact, or continue, punitive legislation against an industry on the plea of a competitive industry.

The dairy industry tries to make the case that its existence is inextricably involved with the national welfare. I regard the dairy industry as highly important. Yet, there are many other highly important industries, farm industries among them, which have keen competition, and which meet it without asking for legislation that hamstrings that competition. There are, for example, almost one and a half million farm families that grow cotton. The entire economy of the South depends to a great extent upon cotton. Nevertheless, cotton meets severe competition from the synthetics without asking that we tax or discriminate legislatively against rayon, or nylon.

The broad point of view on this question was expressed before the Senate Finance Committee last spring by a dairyman, Merritt M. Nash, of Fall City, Wash. He was asked by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] what his attitude would be if a good synthetic substitute for fluid milk came along. This is a part of his answer:

I will say this: I will never stand in the road of progress, not if it puts me out of business. You know, my grandfather, among other things, manufactured carriages, buggies, horse buggies. And when my father bought a Ford, back in 1909, my grandfather disowned him and cut him off with a dollar in his will. "Because," he said, "this is going to be the ruination of this country. It is putting me out of business, and it is putting 25 people who work for me out of business."

But do you think, over the long pull, it was a bad thing to have the automobile industry come in? Every time there is an economic change or a phase of development in this country, it means that a certain segment of our society will be damaged or hurt while we are making that transformation.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the Chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield for a question.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Arkansas referred to a question which the Senator from Nebraska asked of a witness from Washington State at the time of the hearing. I wonder if the Senator from Arkansas considers the reply made by the witness to be a fair reply to the question asked of the witness by the Senator from Nebraska? The witness in his answer made use of the "horse-and-buggy days," which has been succeeded by the day of the automobile, and so forth, as an illustration of what he would do in case a substitute was found for fluid milk. Personally I do not think the example is a very good one, because fluid milk is a product of nature. The horse and buggy, the carriage, and such conveyances, resulted from a process of manufacture. In my opinion the illustration used by the witness is not a very good one.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I think that is clarified a little by the remainder of the witness' answer. I had not completed the reading of his answer. I doubt, however, that a horse would be considered a manufactured article any more than milk is. It was an integral part of the analogy, which seems to me to be quite a good one. Let me conclude the reading of the witness' answer.

Mr. BUTLER. The reference by the witness, however, was not to the horse, but to the vehicle which the horse drew.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The horse accompanied the buggy. It is just as much a part of the picture, I think, as the buggy itself. I will say that later on we may have an analogy to the horse. I do not understand why the dairy industry has not attempted to outlaw tractors, because dairymen rely very heavily on the kind of fertilizer which the cow produces, which is not substantially greater than a horse produces under the same conditions.

I wish to continue reading the answer of Mr. Merritt Nash. I desire to emphasize that this witness is a dairyman. He is not a manufacturer of oleomargarine. He appeared before the committee as a practicing, practical dairyman. He said further in answer to the question asked of him by the senior Senator from Nebraska:

If we were, Senator, ever able to produce a synthetic product that had all of the wonderful qualities of fluid milk and could promote the health of our Nation in the way that fluid milk and butter can, I would be among the first to say, "Mister, if you can produce it with less effort and less cost than I can produce milk, tomorrow I will sell every cow I have got and get into your business or some other one."

It seems to me that answer is a very direct answer to the question propounded to him by the Senator from Nebraska as to what he would do.

This is the broad and statesmanlike point of view, but we do not need to weigh it here. The facts show clearly that there is little danger to dairying from repeal of the antimargarine laws. And there is good ground for thinking that repeal may actually help the dairy industry.

In the first place, butter is the least profitable use for milk. This explains, more than any competition from margarine, the decline in butter production during the past few years.

For example, a hundred pounds of milk, when used for distribution as milk or cream, averaged $5.40 per hundred pounds in the January–November period this year. For all whole milk uses, the average for the period was $3.98 per hundred pounds, but the butterfat in the milk used for butter during this period averaged only $2.46 per hundred pounds. Data on the value of milk used for butter, including an allowance for the value of the byproduct skim milk, are available for only 3 years of this period.

The milk sold as milk and cream was worth more than twice as much as the milk sold only for the manufacture of butter.

I ask at this point unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an exhibit showing comparative prices received for the different major uses of milk in the 1939–49 period.

There being no objection, the table marked "Exhibit I" was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, butter, to repeat, is the least profitable use for milk. It aptly has been called a loss leader for the dairy industry.

Butter production has declined about one-fourth over the past 10 years. Total butter production in 1940 was 2,240,000,000 pounds and the estimate for 1949 is 1,700,000,000 pounds, and 1949 was one of butter's best recent years. I may add that the production in 1948 was not so great. The estimate for 1949 is 200,000,000 pounds greater than was the actual production in 1948.

The decline in butter production, however, has not been accompanied by the disruption of the dairy industry. The industry's most prosperous years have accompanied falling butter production. Total cash receipts from the sale of dairy products rose from $1,345,000,000 in 1939 to approximately $4,433,000,000 in 1948. Total cash receipts from dairying probably will show a decline in 1949 but the figure still will be substantially above the prewar years.

Some of the extra cash in the dairymen's pockets has been due to the general rise in prices, but much of it has been due to the fact that the demand for fluid milk has gone up so sharply. People had money to buy more fluid milk; they wanted it and they bought it. The dairymen sold less of their product as butter, an unprofitable use, and more of it as fluid milk and for the other more profitable uses.

I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in my remarks tables showing butter as a source of dairy income in the 1940–48 period and the use of milk in butter during this same period. (Exhibits II and III.)

There being no objection, the tables marked "Exhibit II" and "Exhibit III" were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I do not propose to attempt to analyze these exhibits in detail, but some of the data shown are very interesting and significant. In 1940, for example, Wisconsin sold 15.60 percent of its milk as butter. In 1948, 2.22 percent of Wisconsin's milk went into butter. In 1940, 14.45 of Wisconsin's dairy cash income came from butter. In 1948 only 1.77 of Wisconsin's dairy cash income came from butter.

In view of this trend I wonder a bit at the concern manifested by the able senior Senator from Wisconsin over the possibility that the antimargarine laws may be repealed.

It seems to me that the dairymen of his State have comparatively little interest in this matter. As progressive and foresighted dairymen should, Wisconsin dairymen are selling their milk where it will bring the most money, and as I have repeatedly pointed out, butter is not one of these uses.

The able senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] is listed as one of the cosponsors of the amendment to H. R. 2023, submitted a few moments ago by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], to confine the manufacture and sale of yellow margarine within State lines. So is his distinguished colleague [Mr. FLANDERS]. I shall refer to this as the Wiley amendment for purposes of reference, using the name of one of its distinguished sponsors. The measure referred to is an antimargarine amendment, and I propose to discuss it in more detail later. Just the same, I am wondering why Vermont's Senators are fighting butter's battle. Even as far back as 1940, only 4.11 percent of Vermont's dairy cash income came from butter. In 1948 this percentage was a puny 0.69 percent. Less than 1 percent of the dairy cash income came from butter.

On November 8, 1949, Ohio voters, by a majority of 483,000, legalized the manufacture and sale of yellow margarine in that State. I plan to refer to the Ohio election later in this discussion, but, in passing, I might comment that only 6.16 percent of Ohio's dairy cash income came from butter in 1948, as compared to 14.61 percent in 1940. These figures may help to explain why so many dairy farmers voted for repeal in Ohio.

Summed up, the exhibits tell us what I have already stated—that butter has steadily declined in importance to dairying during a period of extraordinary prosperity to the industry.

I am not a dairyman, but I doubt, in this period of high labor costs and high feed costs, that there is any money to be made if milk is sold only for the production of butter at an average of $2.46 per hundred pounds. I strongly suspect that the dairy industry as a whole would be better off if some dairymen did not have an obsession about butter, an obsession created and maintained by propaganda. The dairymen, to make money, must concentrate upon the sale of milk where it will bring the highest return. At the risk of belaboring a point, let me say that this highest return is not from butter.

One factor, which deserves special mention in the dairy-industry high income in recent years has been the increase in the production of milk. This, mind you, has taken place during the very years when less and less butter was being manufactured. The production of milk has risen from 106,792,000,000 pounds in 1939 to an estimated production of 118,000,000,000 pounds in 1949, a tremendous increase indeed.

Margarine production registered large increases during these 11 years also. In 1939, for example, about 301,000,000 pounds of margarine were made in this country; the estimate for 1949 is 850,000,000 pounds. Surely, if margarine represents the threat to dairying that some contend, the big jump in the output of margarine over the past 11 years already would have had its effect. Instead, both dairy income and milk production also have gone on upward.

I ask permission to insert in the RECORD at this point tables showing the production of milk, butter, and margarine in the 1939–49 period—exhibit IV.

There being no objection, the table marked "Exhibit IV" was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. FULBRIGHT. But, Mr. President, the butter interests argue there has been a decline in the number of dairy cattle in the past few years, and that this demonstrates the adverse effect upon dairying of margarine's upturn.

I find no substance in these charges. From 1944 to 1948, there was a decrease in the number of milk cows on farms from 25,775,000 to 22,935,000. The butter industry uses these figures in an attempt to prove its point. However, this is an instance, in my opinion, of fitting the figures to the case, and not the case to the figures. In doing so, several important factors are ignored.

First of all, as all students of the livestock industry will agree, there is a cycle in cattle and dairy cow numbers. I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in my remarks a table which illustrates this cycle.

There being no objection, the table marked "Exhibit V" was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. FULBRIGHT. For example, Mr. President, there were 21,191,000 milk cows in 1927, a so-called low point. This number rose to 25,198,000 in 1934, a high point; but in 1938, a low-point year, the total had declined to 23,215,000. Another high-point year ensued in 1944, and 1949 may have been a low-point year. The trend now is upward, and will be, in the ordinary course of events, for several years.

This cycle is overlooked by those serving butter's cause, but it cannot be ignored if we want to be fair and objective. Also, there are additional forces, other than the cycle, which accentuated the drop in milk cow numbers from 1944 to 1948. The rise in meat prices over this period has been rapid. This resulted in the close culling of dairy herds and the sale of many cows for slaughter. Furthermore, feed and labor costs have been high; and dairying, and in particular the manufacture of butter, requires a good deal of farm labor.

In the 1938–49 period, total milk production rose 10 percent, but the number of milk cows decreased by only 1.3 percent. This bears out my view that the least efficient dairy cows have been culled, and dairymen also have been following more efficient farming practices generally. Production per dairy cow reached an all-time high in 1949, and still is climbing. It is very significant to note in those tables the increase in production per cow. I simply wish to call attention to the increase from 1924, when the production per cow was 4,167 pounds, to 1949, when the production per cow was 5,150 pounds—an increase which is very significant, in terms of production per cow.

There is nothing to show that the decline in butter output and the rise in margarine production have injured dairying in any way. Nor does the experience of other dairy countries which place no taxes or restrictions on the sale of margarine, or at least no burdensome restrictions, indicate that the repeal of the antimargarine laws would hurt the dairy industry.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point in my remarks a table showing the per capita consumption of butter and yellow margarine in four dairy countries for the 1938–46 period, no figures being available for the years after 1946.

There being no objection, the table marked "Exhibit VI" was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXHIBIT VI.—Per capita consumption of butter and margarine in countries where yellow margarine is sold

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Actually, the data for the four countries—the Netherlands, Belgium, the United Kingdom, and Sweden—do not indicate any damage to butter in the absence of burdensome legislative restrictions on its competitor.

Similarily, the available data do not bear out the fears of those who foresee a drastic downward trend in butter consumption if we do away with the antimargarine laws.

I request permission to put into the RECORD at this point a table showing margarine and butter per capita consumption, by years, in the 1924–49 period.

There being no objection, the table marked "Exhibit VII" was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. FULBRIGHT. This shows that in 1932, for example, the average per capita consumption of butter was 18.1 pounds, and that of margarine, 1.6 pounds. In 1949, the consumption of butter is estimated at 10.3 pounds per capita, and that of margarine at 5.7 pounds. There has been a slight decrease in margarine consumption by comparison with 1948, and a slight increase in butter consumption. I mention this simply as an aside, for the real significance of the exhibit is that while butter's consumption has declined and that of margarine has gone up, the over-all consumption has declined and that of margarine has gone up, but the over-all consumption of table fat has dropped. The gap left by the fact that not as much butter is being eaten has not been filled by margarine. The nutritionists tell us that the Nation needs more table fat. There is room in our economy for both margarine and butter, and many persons will continue to prefer butter. However, the fight the butter industry has made and still is making on margarine is poor public relations for butter. The butter industry, as the American Milk Review said in an editorial this year, is "doing itself more harm than good" by its attitude toward margarine. As a substitute for the margarine fixation, the Review recommended aggressive salesmanship and enlightened and dynamic merchandising—a substitute which I heartily endorse.

To repeat, the fundamental basis of the butter industry's attitude toward margarine is fear of competition. Even if this fear is well founded—and certainly it is not justified where dairying is concerned—it is an exceedingly poor excuse for the enactment or continuance of punitive legislation against margarine.

Let us now examine some other contentions that the butter industry puts forward to support its plea for protection. Two of these contentions are closely interrelated: The claim that butter has a right to ban, or discriminate, against yellow margarine, and the claim that much margarine will be sold as butter if we remove the restrictions against yellow margarine.

"Why," the butter interests ask, "does margarine insist upon using butter's color, yellow? Let margarine be colored green, or blue, or purple, any color but yellow, which is butter's natural color. That is all we want."

Before I discuss the color and fraud angles of this question, I should point out that the appeal for a ban on yellow margarine does not jibe with the Wiley amendment, previously mentioned, which would confine the manufacture and sale of yellow margarine to intrastate commerce. The Senate should know the reasons for this contradiction. In reality, it is the difference between what the butter industry wants and what it feels it may be able to get.

The butter interests tell us they no longer are opposed to the repeal of the Federal taxes and existing restrictions on margarine. But there is a gimmick in their apparent acquiescence.

After House passage in the Eightieth Congress of a bill which would have repealed the antimargarine laws, the butter interests took stock of their situation. Apparently, they felt that the taxes no longer could be maintained, and that a change of front was needed. This change of front took the form, late in 1948, of a new platform—repeal of the taxes, in return for an outright ban on yellow margarine.

This was the butter interests' "party line" for the margarine fight in the Eighty-first Congress.

Before the House Agriculture Committee, in the first session of the Eighty-first Congress, the butter interests argued for the ban on yellow. But they could not even get that proposal through the House committee, which is one of the friendliest to butter of any committee in the Congress.

The bill reported by the House committee was identical with the Wiley amendment. The amendment, as I see it, is a most curious animal, something like a cross between a zebra and a giraffe. Under it, if a State permits the manufacture and sale of yellow margarine—and 32 States permit this today—yellow margarine could be made and sold in the State, but the margarine so produced could not be shipped across State lines.

On the floor of the House this proposal was soundly defeated, but later it was introduced in the Senate under the sponsorship of the 26 or 27 Senators mentioned a moment ago.

I propose to analyze the Wiley amendment, but first I should like to get back to the color issue. Bear in mind that the butter industry will admit frankly that it would like a complete Federal ban on the manufacture and sale of yellow margarine. Apparently, the only reason for putting the Wiley amendment forward is the feeling that the Senate will not vote that complete ban.

The butter interests' claim to a copyright on yellow rests on the flimsiest of foundations.

Rest assured that if the butter interests could go to the courts and prevent margarine from being colored yellow, they would have done so long ago.

In this connection I refer the Senate to a memorandum on this subject introduced by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] in the record of the Senate Finance Committee hearings on margarine, in April 1949, page 238. The memorandum states:

> Furthermore, the law has been long settled that color alone may not be the subject of a trade-mark. To be a valid trade-mark, the device, design, or other combination to be sustained as a trade-mark must be capable of indicating origin or ownership of the goods. This is true under both the common law and the statutes which provide for registration of trade-marks.

The memorandum cites numerous court decisions bearing on this matter. In Leschen Rope Company v. Broderick (201 U. S. 166), decided almost half a century ago by the Supreme Court, the Court said:

> It is the plain intention of the act that, where the distinction of a mark depends upon color, that will not do.

The butter industry, then, has no right in law to prevent margarine from being colored yellow. But does it have a moral right, or any other right, for exclusion? I think it has none.

A great deal of butter is artificially colored. Spring and summer butter is likely to be yellow; fall and winter butter, practically white. Generally, cows feed on green grass in the spring and summer. The grass is full of the sunshine vitamin, vitamin A, and carotene, which imparts the yellow hue to butter.

Few people, however, know that much butter is artificially colored. The butter makers are not required to state that they use artificial coloring. That is a specific exemption written into the law, which I mentioned a moment ago, passed in 1931. The manufacturers of margarine are required to state that they use artificial coloring if, of course, artificial coloring is added.

The butter makers deceive their customers. The real effect of the artificial coloring is to try to make people believe that it is spring and summer butter, which, of course, is better and superior to the white butter; otherwise they would not use the yellow color. White butter has a lower vitamin A content than yellow butter. The vitamins add healthgiving properties, as I have said, 99 percent of all margarine contains 15,000 units of vitamin A per pound and all margarine, under its Federal standard of identity, must contain not less than 9,000 units.

During the 1902 debate on margarine in Congress, the late Representative Wadsworth, of New York, the father of the present able House member, summed up this whole question:

> It is claimed by the extreme butter men that yellow is the natural butter color and practically no other food product has the right to use it. If that claim is true, what shade of yellow is it entitled to? * * * It is only in the months of May and June, and I speak as a practical butter maker myself when I make the assertion, that creamery butter, and that, of course, is the butter of commerce, has a decided yellow color, or tint, and that color disappears entirely or almost so when the fall and winter sets in. * * * Here are samples of butter purchased by me this morning and no two are alike. As a matter of fact, every sample is artificially colored.
> I deny that butter has the copyright, patent right, or any other right to any particular color, whether yellow or otherwise.
> If coloring oleomargarine a shade of yellow helps to perpetuate a fraud, then the coloring of butter is actually a fraud, because it makes the consumer believe, and necessarily, that fall or winter, or white butter of any season of the year is June butter which generally is considered the best.

Margarine resembles butter in many ways. It is a table spread and would resemble butter if it were colored green, or red, for it is like butter in texture and taste and is used for the same purposes. We assert, therefore, that it should have the right to resemble butter in color.

We deny that margarine tries, or wants to masquerade as butter. We say furthermore that similarity to other products in color, in design, in texture, in use, and in many other ways, is characteristic of thousands upon thousands of domestic products.

Synthetic dyes have almost put natural dyes out of business. The similarity in this case is purely one of color.

If we say, by law, that similarity is prohibited, or is to be penalized, we had better close up our laboratories and turn our backs upon technical and scientific progress.

Over and over again, I have stated that the case of rayon and cotton is analogous to that of butter and margarine. The same thing could be said of rubber and the new synthetic rubbers, or of plastics used for wood or steel, and so on.

If today I proposed an amendment which would tax rayon for its imitation of cotton in color and dozens of other ways, I would be laughed at and rightly so.

I am glad to be able to state that no cotton producer, so far as I know, has ever seriously proposed a tax on rayon, or nylon, or any other competitor of cotton.

Yet, for more than 60 years there has been a Federal tax on margarine. This, it is obvious, is a tax on cottonseed oil, soybean oil, and the other vegetable oils which go into the end product.

There is no way to estimate the loss to the farmers who produce these vegetable oils. Margarine is the second largest single outlet for cottonseed oil; the largest in 1948. In 1948, more than 450,000,000 pounds of cottonseed oil were used in the manufacture of margarine, the equivalent of one and a half million tons of cottonseed. And cottonseed oil accounts for more than half the value of cottonseed, which accounts for about 14 percent of the farmers' gross cash income from the cotton crop.

Margarine is the second largest outlet for soybean oil, shortening being the first. In 1948, margarine consumed 253,000,000 pounds of soybean oil. About 16 percent of all soybean oil produced in this country goes into margarine. This 16 percent, obviously, is very influential in determining the price received for the entire production, since margarine is a high-value usage and the soybean oil which goes into margarine raises the entire price structure of the oil.

The importance of soybean oil to the agricultural economy should not be underestimated. Soybeans are grown on approximately 12 or more million acres of land. In 1948, total production of soybeans approximated 223,000,000 bushels and the cash value of soybeans for beans approximated $506,000,000. Today, soybeans are rated from first to third crop in cash importance in half a dozen States.

The processor makes two commodities from soybeans; one is soybean oil and the other is meal. The prices which the processor receives for the oil and meal determine the price which he can pay the farmer for his soybeans. If the processor sells his soybean oil at a reduced price, he must either increase the price of meal, or decrease the price paid the farmer. He has no alternative.

It is elementary to state that legislation which decreases the use of the vegetable oils is taking money directly from the pockets of the cottonseed and soybean producers and the other producers of vegetable oils.

At this point in the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent to insert an exhibit showing the relative value of soybean oil and butter in the six principal soybean-producing States, which also are great dairy States—exhibit VIII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the table marked "Exhibit VIII" was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXHIBIT VIII.—Cash income from soybean oil and from butter, principal soybean States, 1948

State	Rank in soybean production	Estimated cash income from soybean oil [1]	Cash income from butter [2]
Illinois	1	$96, 883, 000	$19, 872, 000
Iowa	2	46, 779, 000	125, 333, 000

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I have referred to the Ohio referendum on margarine last November 8. Aside from the overwhelming victory for margarine in this election, it is extremely interesting to note that margarine won in 26 counties out of 48 counties where dairy products are the chief source of cash farm income. The butter forces carried only 23 such counties.

I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD an analysis of the margarine referendum in Ohio:

There being no objection, the table marked "Exhibit IX" was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXHIBIT IX. THE 1949 OHIO ELECTION AND ITS IMPLICATIONS

Proposals to legalize the manufacture and sale of yellow margarine in Ohio were rejected at the last two sessions of the Ohio Legislature, having once died in committee, and having in 1949 gained approval of the Ohio senate only to be beaten in the Ohio house.

Ohio consumers decided to carry the issue to the voters under the Ohio initiative law. Petitions were signed by more than 426,000 qualified voters and filed with the Ohio secretary of state, who gave the margarine proposal the top position on the special questions and issues ballot for the November 8 election.

The movement was spearheaded by 32,000 Ohio housewives who banded together in an organization named the Association of Voters for Yellow Margarine.

Not to be overlooked, however, was the inherent political strength of Ohio's 92,000 milk-producing farm families (of whom, however, fewer than 39,000 sold cream for butter) and the fact that Ohio's gross cash income from dairy products in 1948 amounted to $233,344,000, or $22.24 of each $100 of Ohio farm cash income.

The complete and official result of the November 8 election as announced by the Ohio secretary of state was:

For yellow margarine	1, 282, 606
Against yellow margarine	799, 473
Majority favoring yellow margarine	483, 133

Surprising to no one were the substantial majorities accorded yellow margarine in seven of nine metropolitan areas, with Cincinnati giving the proposal a 4 to 1 ratio; Cleveland, almost 3 to 1; Columbus, almost 3 to 1; Dayton, 2 to 1; Akron, 2 to 1; Toledo, 2 to 1, and Canton, 4 to 3.

One unexpected development was that yellow margarine carried 44 of Ohio's 88 counties.

But the truly surprising element came in the voting record of 24 of Ohio's most highly agriculturalized counties, 14 of which derive more income from dairy products than from any other farm crop, and in 8 of which dairying is the second most important source of farm income.

ALL 24 OF THESE COUNTIES FAVORED YELLOW MARGARINE

The voting record of the 24 counties in question, together with the percentage of total cash farm income accounted for by dairy products, and a listing of the relative importance of dairy products, follows:

County	For	Against	Percentage of farm income from dairying (1945)	Relative importance of dairying (1948)
Athens	6, 964	5, 845	48	First.
Clermont	6, 300	4, 905	27	Do.
Coshocton	5, 094	4, 750	34	Do.
Crawford	6, 407	5, 324	14	Second.
Defiance	3, 585	3, 508	19	First.

Miami	8, 739	6, 470	24	First.
Ottawa	3, 839	3, 201	16	Second.
Perry	4, 672	4, 003	25	First.
Portage	9, 355	7, 809	43	Do.
Ross	7, 010	6, 275	14	Second.
Sandusky	6, 982	5, 972	20	First.
Seneca	7, 402	7, 110	19	Second.
Van Wert	4, 532	4, 376	15	Third.
Warren	4, 321	3, 781	25	Second.
Washington	8, 754	5, 168	33	First.
Wood	7, 823	7, 587	12	Fifth.

Dairying also is a highly important source of farm income in 13 other counties which favored yellow margarine; each of which, however, includes a town or city of substantial importance, but none of which includes a large city. Their voting record, together with the percentage of cash income from dairy products, and a listing of the relative importance of dairy products, follows:

County	For	Against	Percent of farm income from dairying (1945)	Relative importance of dairying (1948)
Allen	13, 427	8, 818	18	Second.
Belmont	13, 582	12, 548	54	First.
Butler	23, 872	12, 750	29	Second.
Clark	13, 849	6, 513	24	Do.
Columbiana	13, 239	12, 733	45	First.
Jefferson	14, 188	13, 384	50	Do.
Lake	9, 328	4, 556	9	Fourth.
Licking	9, 680	8, 104	33	First.
Lorain	16, 029	11, 517	32	Do.
Muskingum	12, 697	10, 181	32	Do.
Richland	13, 030	8, 691	25	Do.
Scioto	13, 813	9, 831	32	Do.
Tuscarawas	9, 430	8, 809	46	Do.

Lumping the two groups of counties together, it is seen that yellow margarine was favored by 23 in which dairy products are the No. 1 source of farm cash income, and by 11 in which dairy products are the No. 2 source of farm cash income.

Carrying the projection still further, dairying is the principal source of farm revenue in Hamilton (Cincinnati), Stark (Canton), and Summit (Akron) Counties, and is the second most important source of farm income in Franklin (Columbus) and Montgomery (Dayton) Counties. All of the latter also favored yellow margarine.

Thus, in over-all total, yellow margarine won out in 26 counties where dairy products rank first, and in 13 where they rank second.

(Sources of data: Election results, Ohio secretary of state; percent farm income from dairying, based on United States census of 1945; relative importance of dairying, Ohio State University, department of rural economics, Bulletin No. 206 (1948).)

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It bears out an assertion I have made time and time again that dairymen, themselves, are beginning to understand that they have no interest in the attempt to perpetuate the Federal and State antimargarine laws.

I have shown that butter has no right at law, or no moral right, to prevent margarine from being colored yellow at the factory. But what about the assertion that wholesale fraud will result if we take away legislative restrictions on the manufacture and sale of yellow margarine?

This argument can be disposed of fairly quickly. The danger of fraud if we legalize tax-free yellow margarine is negligible.

Under existing law which would not be changed by repeal of the taxes on margarine, margarine must be labeled as such. The labeling requirements are so strict and so well enforced that no nouseholder is in danger of being deceived.

Margarine is not sold in loose, or unpackaged form, as is some butter. It is not sold in tubs. A merchant could take the wrapper off margarine sticks and perhaps palm them off as butter. Few grocers in their right minds would attempt such a thing. The penalty is all out of proportion to the risk involved. The penalty is the standard one for fraud in the sale of food, and for an intentional offense, or repeated offenses, can be a maximum of 3 years in prison and a $10,000 fine. That, I may say, is the existing law, which will not be disturbed. I refer to the existing Food and Drug Act.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. GILLETTE. The penalty to which the distinguished Senator alludes is the penalty under the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act for violation of the prohibitions therein set forth, is it not?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is correct. The removal of the label by the retailer certainly would constitute such a violation and subject him to the penalty.

About 93 percent of all margarine sold goes to homes. I have heard no instance where a housewife complained that she asked for butter, paid for butter, and got margarine instead. There may be a few such instances but they are very few indeed. Nor have I ever heard anyone seriously insist that there is any real danger of deception in margarine sales to homes. By "homes" I mean through the regular retail outlets for home consumption.

Sales to bakers, confectioners, and the like amount to about 3½ percent of the margarine sold. These purchasers do not care whether the margarine they buy is white or yellow. They use it in cooking and in the making of their products.

There is then no real danger of fraud in the case of 96½ percent of all margarine sold, whether that margarine be yellow or white. This leaves 3½ percent of the margarine consumed unaccounted for. Most of this 3½ percent is sold in public eating places. Charges have been made that many restaurants are substituting margarine for butter. I think the average restaurant operator is an honest and law-abiding citizen, and I doubt that he wishes either to deceive his customers or to violate the law.

However, H. R. 2023 covers the small area where repeal might increase the prospects of fraud. As I have previously said, the bill before the Senate requires that a public eating place which serves yellow margarine must post a notice to that effect, or print, in type not smaller than that used to describe any other article of food, such a notice on the menu itself. It also requires that each separate serving of yellow margarine in a public eating place must be identified as such, or served in a triangular shape which would be a form of identification. If the individual serving was not brought to the table in a triangular shape, the identification must conform to regulations to be prescribed by the Food and Drug Administration. The Administration might require the identification to be carried on the plate, or to be marked on the paper on which the margarine was placed. Undoubtedly it would be adequate.

The Wiley substitute bill provides no additional protection whatever against the sale of margarine as butter in public eating places, the only area where there is any real danger of fraud.

We have not answered the question by the butter industry as to why margarine wants to use the color yellow, but that answer is fairly obvious.

The butter industry knows very well that consumers want their table spread, whether margarine or butter, served yellow. Imagine, for example, eating green margarine, or green butter, even if it were just as nutritious and tasty as yellow margarine, or yellow butter. Imagine drinking red milk, even though the coloring which made it so was perfectly harmless. We are all familiar with the common practice with respect to oranges. I do not think the coloring of an orange improves it any, but, for the same kind of reason, everyone colors oranges today in the markets. It is merely a habit.

We develop a set of food habits, which include eye appeal, as well as taste appeal, just as we develop other habits. We have been taught to like our butter served yellow and our margarine served yellow. That is why millions of housewives, and quite a few husbands also, go to the trouble of mixing yellow coloring into margarine before they put it on the table. This is a messy and time-consuming chore and I do not wonder that millions of consumers are angry because we force them to do it. Repeal would do away with that nuisance task in 32 States and the District of Columbia and, I am fully confident, eventually in all 48 States.

I have sketched the history of the Wiley amendment and have called it a curious animal. It represents still a new party line for the butter interests. It is completely at variance with the previous contention of the industry that there should be a Federal ban upon the manufacture and sale of all yellow margarine.

If we are going to legalize the sale of yellow margarine, why confine that manufacture and sale within State lines? If there is danger of fraud in the sale of yellow margarine, the Wiley amendment does nothing to avert that danger. If the dairy industry is threatened by the repeal of the antimargarine laws, the Wiley amendment does not dissipate that threat.

Eventually, if the current trend against the antimargarine laws continues, every State will permit the manufacture and sale of yellow margarine. Under the Wiley amendment, every State, to have yellow margarine, must have a plant within the State. Undoubtedly, almost every State would have a plant, or plants, in the future, although some of the poorer and more thinly populated States might not be able to support such a factory.

There is a certain selfish appeal in the prospect of a margarine plant, or plants, in every State. Nevertheless, if we are going back to the articles of confederation, there is much more to be done. We should, for example, confine the manufacture and sale of automobiles to intrastate commerce. We should confine the manufacture and sale of farm machinery to State lines, and so on down the almost interminable list of our products.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator will yield once more to me?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. GILLETTE. If I correctly understood the able Senator from Arkansas a few moments ago, in mentioning the safeguards which his bill places on the use of oleomargarine in eating places, he stated that the bill required both the clear labeling of the article and also that an individual serving be cut in a triangular form.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. First, there must be notice that oleomargarine is being served. That is absolute. Then there must be individual labeling, or the article must be in a triangular shape. There must be one or the other.

Mr. GILLETTE. Then I misunderstood the Senator. I understood him to say that both were required.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. One or the other, but there must be notice.

Mr. GILLETTE. The alternatives are labeling of the serving and serving the article in triangular shape.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Individual labeling, yes, but that is not an alternative to the general requirement that notice be given.

Mr. GILLETTE. I should like to ask the Senator, also, if his statement means that each individual serving must be in triangular form. I submit that the language of the bill does not so provide. As the Senator well knows, there are many eating places which serve the bread spread in a dish. It may be a pound, a half-pound, or a quarter-pound, to which the diner can help himself. That would be a separate serving; it would not be an individual serving. I am sure the Senator does not believe that the language which is contained in the bill would provide that an individual serving must be triangular in shape——

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I had not thought of that. Generally speaking, there are very few places which are so free with their butter or margarine as to put a whole pound of it on the table.

Mr. GILLETTE. In Iowa it is quite common to put a pound of butter on the table.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. In Iowa, the land of plenty, that may be true. Very few of us are favored by coming from that State.

I will say to the Senator that I have never taken the position of objecting to any reasonable, practical way of giving notice, because those of us who are interested in margarine have no desire that one ounce of margarine be disguised and sold as butter. We think it has sufficient merits to stand on its own feet. As I told the committee twice, I should be willing to support any kind of a plan that is calculated to be workable.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one further question?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. GILLETTE. The Senator has just stated that he is in favor of any practical method of protection. But there are alternative proposals. One proposal is that the article be labeled, and the other proposal is that the article be cut in triangular form. Has the Senator in mind any way in which an individual serving of butter can be labeled? Would the label have to be printed on it?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. My idea is that the little oiled paper plate on which it is served should carry the identification.

Mr. GILLETTE. Then the Senator would identify the plate and not the margarine.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The plate on which it is served. The committee discussed the question of having the margarine itself bear an imprint, but both butter and margarine melt quite quickly, so that that would not be a practical way of handling the situation. It was deemed, and, I think, correctly, by the committee, that that would not be a practical way. The most practical, easiest, and surest way is to make the identification on the plate on which the butter or margarine is served.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield for a question.

Mr. WILEY. I was interested a few moments ago in the Senator's comment that the producers of oleomargarine would not want to accept any other color than yellow. I listened to his reasoning in that connection. He did not mention the fact that ice creams are made of practically every color of the rainbow. There is red, white, and blue ice cream; ice cream may be of various shades of red. I assume that the very objective is to give oleo the right to enter into the field so that it can take over the spread market. Is that not the very purpose of it?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I should certainly not deny that one of the objectives of the persons interested in margarine is its sale. We are interested in its free sale in competition with any other food article. That certainly is one of the motives. I tried to make the point that as a matter of habit the American people are accustomed to their spread being yellow, just as in the case of oranges they are accustomed to a certain tint. Some of the very best oranges are tinted with artificial color. It is for the same reason that the butter producers tint and color winter butter to make it look like summer butter. They have exactly the same motive—to make it acceptable.

Mr. WILEY. There used to be only one kind of ice cream. Now, as I say, every kind of color is used in ice cream. There are different kinds of tinted ice cream, orange, lemon, and other colors.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Vanilla ice cream is still white, is it not? I have never seen any black vanilla ice cream.

Mr. WILEY. All ice cream usually has some vanilla in it. It is clearly demonstrated that the producers of oleomargarine do not want to try any of those colors.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The American people prefer yellow color for their spread. They do not seem to care for any other color. I do not know why that is true. Why do they prefer oranges to be a certain color? Ninety percent of all oranges are artificially colored. That was not so in the past. I cannot explain why, but now it is a general practice.

Mr. WILEY. Then the purpose is to take over the spread market. That is what the proponents of the bill seek to do.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The purpose is to sell margarine. I had hoped I had made it clear that that was the principal interest not only of those who make margarine, but of those who produce soybean oil, and so on. I hope I have never left the impression that there is any other purpose than to have a free, open, untrammeled market in which oleomargarine can compete, just as in all other fields. In the case of cotton, nylon and rayon compete freely with cotton. That is an analogous case. If we had attempted to impose a restriction to the effect that no nylon could be sold unless it were colored black, what would the reaction have been? Why is it that we like white shirts? Why do we not wear black shirts, as men in Italy did at one time? I do not know why we like white shirts. They are very uneconomical. It takes twice as much money to keep them presentable as if we wore black shirts, but Senators know we do wear white shirts.

The same observations apply to artificial leather, which is made to look like real leather. I do not know why the growers and producers of livestock, the source of leather—hogs and cattle—did not have a law passed prohibiting the sale of artificial leather; but they did not. Of course, the oleomargarine law is a unique act. No similar act has ever been passed by the Congress. It completely contradicts the whole idea of a free, competitive market. I challenge any butter advocate to cite a precedent in our laws, or a similar case, when we undertook by governmental action to throttle competition in a legitimate article of commerce. I do not think there is any such case.

Of course, the suggestion that the making and sale of automobiles, or farm machinery, or any other legitimate product, be confined within State lines, is absurd. Yet, these suggestions are no more absurd than the proposal that we confine the making and sale of yellow margarine within State lines—for it, too, is a perfectly good and legitimate product.

The Wiley amendment would disrupt the entire margarine industry, and would sharply raise costs to consumers. The margarine industry, like other mass-production industries, has been built in line with the factors which make for efficiency and a good, inexpensive product. The amendment would disrupt the distribution pattern of margarine, which has been built up on the availability of fats and oils, the consumer demand for margarine, the availability of labor, and many other factors. What would happen, for example, to Wisconsin's great cheese industry if we passed a Federal law confining the manufacture and sale of cheese to intrastate limits?

Frankly, I am surprised that it is necessary to take the time of the Senate to argue the merits and demerits of the Wiley amendment. Nevertheless, 25 Senators, all able and earnest men, are sponsoring the measure. It is necessary, then, to deal with it seriously.

I regard the Wiley amendment as thoroughly mischievous in nature. I believe that its approval would put the Senate in a ridiculous and indefensible position.

The Wiley amendment represents the spirit of the Articles of Confederation, which almost wrecked this country in its early days. The Wiley amendment harks back to the era of dirt roads, oxcarts, carriages, flatboats, and sailing vessels. It is a return to the thinking which prevailed when State after State levied taxes and embargoes upon the products of other States.

Even an agrarian economy could not get along under the Articles of Confederation and the trade wars which accompanied the shaky union of the fledgling States. If Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, and other great men of that day had not had the vision of a great free-trade territory, this country would have split into a number of quarreling and belligerent States. The interminable wars of Europe might have been paralleled in the history of North America.

Today, we are insisting that western Europe unite economically and establish a free-trade area which would promote stability and prosperity. At the same time, we find Senators insisting that we limit the manufacture and sale of a perfectly good food product, made in this country from domestic materials, to State limits.

Testifying before the Senate Finance Committee last April, I reviewed in some detail the circumstances which led to the adoption of the commerce clause of the Constitution. This clause was an indispensable accompaniment for a real union of the States.

The late Mr. Justice Rutledge of the Supreme Court has pointed out that the adoption of the principle of free trade among the States even preceded the adoption of the indispensable domestic freedoms secured by the first amendment. He said:

> Only later were they added, by popular demand. It was rather to secure the freedom of trade, to break down the barriers to its free flow, that the Annapolis convention was called, only to adjourn with a view to Philadelphia. Thus the generating source of the Constitution lay in the rising volume of restraints upon commerce which the Confederation could not check. These were the proximate causes of our national existence down to today.

That quotation is found in Rutledge's A Declaration of Legal Faith, page 25.

Congress has the power to prohibit the movement of goods in interstate commerce, but that authority has been used gingerly and sparingly. Almost exclusively, that power has been in the case of products which were considered harmful, dangerous, and deleterious. Some instances are: Stolen motor vehicles, the white-slave traffic, kidnaped persons, adulterated and misbranded foods under the pure-food laws, diseased livestock and plants. Margarine does not fall into any of these categories.

The Wiley amendment meets none of the real questions involved in our consideration of the antimargarine laws.

The Senate should face this matter squarely. If margarine should not be allowed to use yellow coloring, we should say so. If it is to be allowed to use yellow coloring, we should remove all restrictions upon the product, and let butter and margarine compete squarely and fairly in the market place.

Still another argument used against repeal of the antimargarine laws is that removal of the restrictions upon yellow margarine would not benefit the consumer. The assertion is that the manufacturers, or the retailers, or both, would mark up the price of yellow margarine until there would be comparatively little difference between it and the price of butter.

During the hearings before committees, and in debates on the floors, this matter has risen time and time again. Data purporting to show profiteering already in yellow margarine have been inserted in the record of hearings. I am told that the butter industry relied heavily upon this price argument during the recent contest in Ohio, obviously not a very persuasive argument, however.

The price phase of this controversy has interested me very much. If consumers are not to benefit by repeal, there certainly is a question about scrapping the antimargarine laws. Consequently, I have investigated this to the limit of my ability.

Before going further into the actual spreads today between yellow and white margarine and the prospective spreads in the future, I should like to say that profiteering in yellow margarine after repeal is highly improbable in the face of a keenly competitive margarine industry.

No margarine company, I am reliably informed, products more than 10 or 12 percent of the margarine made in the United States, and certainly there is the keenest of competition for margarine sales. If the industry operated on monopolistic lines, there would have been profiteering long ago.

To come back to the question of existing price spreads between white and yellow margarine, I recently queried the manufacturers of margarine about their pricing policies with regard to white and yellow. In every instance, the manufacturers have formally advised me, they charge 10 or 11 cents more for yellow, only enough to cover the Federal tax and additional packaging costs. I have a fully documented case that there is no profiteering at the manufacturer's level.

But what about retail spreads? Within the past month, I sent out 8,700 questionnaires to retail grocers who handle yellow margarine in the 32 States and the District of Columbia which permit its sale. These covered the pricing practices of far more than 8,700 stores, since about 200 of the queries were sent to heads of chain stores. I asked the stores to give me detailed information on the spread between the prices charged for white and yellow, brand by brand, on the day preceding receipt of the questionnaire.

I ask permission to insert at this point in the RECORD a copy of my letter, a copy of the questionnaire, and a summary of the results of the survey.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., December 19, 1949.
To the Grocer Addressed:

As sponsor in the Senate of a bill to repeal the Federal antimargarine laws, I am writing to ask a small favor. Would you kindly fill out and return to me at your very earliest convenience the enclosed form listing average retail prices in stores within your jurisdiction for the same brands of white and yellow margarine on the day before you receive this letter?

Perhaps you wonder why I seek this information. The reason is very simple. My bill would repeal the 10-cent-per-pound tax on yellow margarine and the $48 annual license fee now required of grocers who handle the product. This bill, which would also repeal all the other Federal margarine taxes and fees, is scheduled to be considered by the Senate early in January. During the early discussions of this measure the following question has arisen:

"What is the difference between the retail price of white and yellow margarine?"

My hope is to have the facts available. This can best be done by surveying actual margarine prices in representative stores and then letting the truth and the facts speak for themselves.

In filling out the enclosed questionnaire I ask that you be completely frank and honest in setting down your price quotations. I am interested only in the general statistical results, and I am not concerned with your pricing operations, taken individually. After being recorded, your reply will be destroyed and the survey results will not be otherwise used.

Thanking you in advance for your cooperation, I am,

Very sincerely yours,

J. W. FULBRIGHT.

[1] Determined from 26,210 comparisons of retail prices of white and yellow margarine of the same brand in 6,829 stores on 1 day.
[2] No retail dealers in yellow margarine because of State tax of 20 cents a pound, and other restrictions.
[3] Not computed. Only 18 retailers licensed as of October 1949 from whom insufficient data were received to constitute a reliable sample.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, if the Senators will examine the letter and the questionnaire, I think they will agree with me that I made an effort to get an absolutely unbiased report on this matter.

The queries were sent to stores, large and small, chain and independent, city, town, and rural; and the returns gave a thoroughly representative sample from these groups. They covered the operations of 6,829 stores, or about 17 percent of the stores selling yellow margarine. This constitutes, as anyone familiar with surveys knows, a very heavy sample.

The survey showed that the average retailer selling yellow margarine simply charges enough for the product to cover his extra costs. As a matter of fact, the retail spread between yellow and white margarine could well be more than 11 cents and still not be out of line. Evidently a good many retailers are absorbing some of the extra costs of yellow margarine.

For example, replies from Ohio retailers showed that the average spread between white and yellow of the same brand in that State, which legalized the sale of margarine last November 8, was only 9.3 cents.

The average spread in 32 States between white and yellow margarine was 10.8 cents per pound.

Let me briefly sum up some other facts shown by the survey.

Approximately 48 percent of the spreads were 10 cents per pound or less.

About 62 percent, including the 48 percent, were 11 cents or less.

Similarly, about 83 percent were 12 cents or less, and nearly 90 percent were 13 cents or less.

As I have stated, many retailers are absorbing some of the extra cost of yellow margarine. The grocers who are charging 10 or 11 cents more are simply passing on the extra direct costs of yellow to their customers. Those who are charging 12 or 13 cents extra for yellow are only trying to get back the $48 license fee.

Judged by any standard, 90 percent of the spreads reported are completely reasonable. Few instances were reported where the spreads between white and yellow seem out of line. There are logical explanations for most of these instances. It is a common practice for many grocers to reduce prices on white to attract customers; in other words, to make loss leaders of certain brands of white. In these cases, and there were a good many in this survey, a wide spread was created, not by advancing the price of yellow, but rather by cutting the price of white to a loss, or no profit level.

Many grocers also went to some pains to explain their wider margins as an attempt to recover the $48 license fee. These were small retailers who sell only limited amounts of margarine, and their spread between yellow and white had to be relatively high to enable them to get their money back. Finally, as in all commodities, there are prices which seem high and which can be explained only by the fact that the grocer, whatever his reason, saw a chance to make an extra profit and took it. As any one of us knows, we can find an occasional high price for almost any article in trade.

In the case of yellow margarine, one of the reasons why some grocers have an opportunity to charge extra is the fact that only about one grocer in eight holds a license to sell the product. Some grocers are the only ones in their area who sell yellow and have what amounts to a local monopoly. This affords an opportunity for petty profiteering.

The repeal of the Federal antimargarine laws will put an end to this kind of thing, and very quickly. All retailers, or almost all, in the States which permit the sale of yellow will deal in the product. With every retailer selling yellow margarine, he must compete or see the business go to his rivals.

If the Senate is really concerned about the danger of profiteering in yellow margarine—and there is no reason for that concern even now—the way to deal with that concern is to repeal the Federal antimargarine laws.

Before leaving this subject I should like to point out that the argument that repeal will do the consumer no good because of high prices charged for yellow is out of line with the allegation that repeal will injure the dairy industry.

If the price charged for yellow margarine is raised sharply, more people will buy butter, fewer people will buy margarine. The butter industry is well aware of this situation. The price scare story simply is propaganda to frighten the consumers, who have been the real impetus behind the drive for repeal.

Finally I would like to ask the Senate to consider this issue on its merits and to express the hope that amendments which deal with other subjects will be rejected.

This matter has been waiting its turn for a long, long time. We should dispose of it and not allow it to be sidetracked any longer. We ask, in all fairness, that the Senate be allowed to vote on this question without beclouding the issue. The people have a right to know where we stand.

In March 1948 I tried to repeal the antimargarine laws by an amendment to a pending tax bill. I had been unsuccessful in my appeals to the Senate leadership to allow a vote on the margarine bill directly.

The then chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN], made the point that the margarine amendment should not be attached to the tax bill. For the information of the Senate I should like to quote some of his remarks at the time. He said:

> Neither the majority nor the Senate Finance Committee is taking any position on the policy involved in the merits of the amendment.

That was my amendment to repeal the antimargarine laws.

> A Senator may vote to keep this amendment out of the bill, without prejudicing his position in favor of removing the taxes from oleomargarine. We are not going into the merits of that. Our position is that it has no place in the pending bill, and that if it were put in the bill, it would necessarily be dropped in the conference; that it is unwise to put it in this bill, because if we opened the door to extraneous matters, we would wind up here in a state of complete scatteration, instead of getting the kind of bill we wish to get.

I have no doubt that his cogent and forceful plea had a great effect upon the Senate, for my amendment was defeated by a vote of 45 to 33. I felt, and still feel, that a substantial majority of the Senate favored repeal when that vote was taken, just as I feel that a heavy majority of the Senate favors repeal today.

Almost 2 years have gone by since the Senate vote referred to and to this day the Senate has not expressed itself directly on the question of repeal. Following the line of reasoning so aptly stated in 1948 by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN], I ask the Senate, whatever their views on extraneous amendments, to reject them and to vote upon repeal of the Federal antimargarine laws.

To summarize, I sincerely believe that repeal of the antimargarine laws would not injure the dairy industry; butter has no copyright, or trade-mark, on the color yellow; there is no danger of fraud if we repeal the antimargarine laws, nor is there any danger of profiteering in yellow margarine if we scrap these outmoded and antiquated statutes.

Perhaps, I should have devoted more time to talking about the public interest in this matter. As I have said, the strong and incessant drive toward repeal of these laws has come from the consumers. They see no reason why we should continue legislation which increases the costs of a perfectly good food and which forces housewives to waste time and food in coloring margarine. They want something done about this matter. They intend to have something done about it.

Public sentiment is clamoring for repeal of the antimargarine laws. More than 90 percent of the newspapers of the country are asking for repeal. Most of the leading radio commentators are asking for the same thing. Labor and church groups want repeal, as do many other organizations whose only interest in this matter is the public interest.

A little reflection should convince anyone that the margarine laws are wrong in principle and that they constitute barriers to free trade and fair competition.

The trend, and a most decisive one, all over this country is toward an end to antimargarine legislation. In 1901, 32 States prohibited the manufacture and sale of yellow margarine. Today, as I have repeated, 32 States permit the sale of yellow margarine. Five States, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Missouri, and New Jersey, abolished their yellow margarine prohibitions in 1948. Last year New Hampshire, California, Tennessee, and Ohio joined the parade.

If anyone has any doubt about what the people think I again call his attention to the results of the Ohio election where a great dairy State, by an overwhelming margin, voted in November to scrap its antimargarine laws.

The people have told us what they think. It is time for us to tell them what we think.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not know whether other proponents of the measure wish to address the Senate this afternoon, or whether any of the opponents of the measure wish to address the Senate this afternoon. Has the Senator from Arkansas finished his address?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If the Senator will yield, Mr. President, I will say I have finished my opening remarks on the subject. I had thought that the committee amendments might be adopted this afternoon. I understand they are noncontroversial.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I was going to ask if we could dispose of the committee amendments this afternoon, because the fight in the Senate, of course, is on the merits of the proposal.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. GILLETTE. It was the expectation of the Senator from Iowa to speak on this measure today, but I have conferred with some of the cosponsors of the substitute measure, and it would now seem to me to be advisable to adopt the committee amendments, if that can be done, and then let the question of debate on the substitute measure be taken up tomorrow.

Mr. GEORGE. That is agreeable to me, if it is agreeable to the majority leader.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I have no objection to that procedure. I defer to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]. After the committee amendments are adopted we can then hold everything in abeyance until tomorrow.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not believe any of the committee amendments are controversial. The first committee amendment is one that those opposed to the bill will naturally favor. The Finance Committee was of the opinion that the possession of oleomargarine in a form ready for serving should likewise be controlled. That is a matter dealt with by the first committee amendment which appears on page 2 of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 2, line 15, after the word "serving", to insert "or the processing in a form ready for serving."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 5, after the word "unless", to strike out "(1)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 11, after the word "food", to strike out "items; and no" and insert "items."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 14, after the word "unless", to insert "(1)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 16, after "(2)", to strike out "such colored oleomargarine or colored margarine is molded and shaped in such manner so as to have three sides (exclusive of the ends) and no person shall serve colored oleomargarine or colored margarine at a public eating place, whether or not a charge is made therefor, unless."

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, before that amendment is acted upon I wish to be heard.

The amendment we are now considering, as I understand, is on page 3, line 16, to strike out "such colored oleomargarine or colored margarine is molded and shaped in such manner so as to have three sides (exclusive of the ends) and no person shall serve colored oleomargarine or colored margarine at a public eating place, whether or not a charge is made therefor, unless."

I should like to have an explanation of the amendment. The language was apparently in the original bill, and is now proposed to be taken out.

Mr. GEORGE. That language was in the House bill.

Mr. WILEY. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. The language was a bit confusing to the Finance Committee. The Finance Committee was of the opinion that retention of the language would result in confusion. In an effort to clarify, the committee offered the amendment to strike. I will say to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin that the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN], and I believe the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] also participated in this amendment.

Our whole purpose was to make certain precisely what this section meant. If this amendment should be adopted and the bill as thus amended should finally pass, the whole question of difference between the original House language and the new language which we have suggested by way of substitution would be in conference, and it could there be ironed out, if we were laboring under a misapprehension that there was some confusion in the section.

If the Senator will look at the committee report, it will be seen that this matter is fully explained. I refer now to page six of the committee report, at which point there is a discussion of subsection (b) of section 3:

> Subsection (b) as amended by your committee requires persons who possess colored oleomargarine or colored margarine in a form ready for serving at public eating places to (1) post a notice that oleomargarine or margarine is served in a prominent and conspicuous place in the establishment, or (2) place such a notice on the menu in type or lettering not smaller than that normally used to designate other food items. Persons who shall serve colored oleomargarine or colored margarine at a public eating place are required to (1) cause each separate serving thereof to bear labeling, or to be accompanied by labeling, identifying it as oleomargarine or margarine, or (2) cause each separate serving thereof to be triangular in shape.

The discussion preceding that clearly indicates that the whole purpose of the committee was not to weaken the House language, but, rather, to clarify it and make certain and definite what the Senate Finance Committee regarded as a confusing expression.

Mr. WILEY. I understand that.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me say that on page 5 the following will be found, under the discussion of section 3 (b):

> Section 3 (b) amends section 301 of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act by adding a new paragraph thereto which prohibits the serving of colored oleomargarine or colored margarine in violation of the new section 407 (b) of such act. Section 407 (b) regulates not only the public eating place transaction of serving colored oleomargarine or colored margarine but also places certain requirements upon public eating places which possess colored oleomargarine or colored margarine in a form ready for serving.

I should be very glad to answer any further questions which I can answer. I point out that in this instance the purpose was to amend this section so as to meet the objection which was raised very largely by the opponents of the bill. They thought it confusing. The committee was quite willing to clarify it, and the amendment was presented for that purpose. I think the distinguished Senator from Colorado was very largely responsible for the amendment, although all of us concurred in adopting the amendment in the committee.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at this time?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WILEY. It seems to me that by striking out this language, we shall be doing away with what I thought was one of the peculiar features of the argument made by the Senator who spoke before the Senator from Georgia addressed the Senate, when he mentioned that colored oleomargarine would have to be molded in some such shape as that stated here.

But now we have this language:

> No person shall serve colored oleomargarine or colored margarine at a public eating place, whether or not any charge is made therefor, unless (1) each separate serving bears or is accompanied by labeling identifying it as oleomargarine or margarine, or.

Then the committee recommends striking out the following:

> (2) such colored oleomargarine or colored margarine is molded and shaped in such manner so as to have three sides (exclusive of the ends) and no person shall serve colored oleomargarine or colored margarine at a public eating place, whether or not a charge is made therefor, unless.

I understand the argument, namely, that by striking out subdivision (2), the remaining subdivision (1), as previously read, together with the language at the conclusion of the paragraph—namely, "each separate serving thereof is triangular in shape"—will make more clear the idea that is embodied in subparagraphs (1) and (2).

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly. In that connection, let me point out that the following appears at the middle of page 6 of the committee report:

> The committee feels that subsection (b) in the form in which it passed the House is somewhat ambiguous. Although the foregoing would appear to be what the language of the subsection says—

And we have discussed it—

> other interpretations are possible and have been offered. The committee amendment seeks therefore to clarify subsection (b), to make its terms explicit, and eliminate the possibility for misinterpretation and confusion. Since the requirements of 407 (b) are enforceable by criminal actions as well as suits for injunction (secs. 302 and 303, Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act), it is very essential that the language of this subsection be clear and unmistakable.

This amendment is not made for the purpose of changing the meaning of the language adopted by the House, as we interpret its meaning to be; but since some different interpretation was suggested by way of argument, the distinguished Senator from Colorado, who is a very able lawyer, was of the opinion that it should be clarified in this way. I can assure the Senator that is the whole purpose.

If we should subsequently discover any real reason for wishing to reopen it, I should be very glad to do so, if the amendment is now agreed to.

Mr. WILEY. Let me ask the Senator to interpret for me the meaning of the words "each separate serving."

A few moments ago there was some discussion between the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] and the Senator who previously spoke, in relation to this terminology.

Mr. GEORGE. It means each square or piece of oleomargarine actually served, whether it is served to the same customer or to different customers, whether they are at the same table or different tables, or whether to a multitude of customers in the same restaurant. It means that each serving, whether it consists of one triangular piece or two or more, shall be identified as this proposed act requires.

The alternative identification is, of course, serving in the triangular shape, which will preclude the possibility of cutting it into squares, as butter is usually cut, or into balls, as butter sometimes is molded.

Mr. WILEY. It does not necessarily mean each individual serving; does it?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I think it does. That was our interpretation of it, namely, each individual serving has to be so marked.

Mr. WILEY. In other words, if there were four people sitting at one table and served separately from four people who were at another table, the Senator from Georgia would feel that each serving would have to be marked separately, would he?

Mr. GEORGE. If margarine is served to the four people or to any of the four people, it must be so marked and identified. It cannot be identified wholesale.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me for a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I am glad to yield.

Mr. GILLETTE. In the interpretation the Senator from Georgia has just placed on this language, the Senator from Georgia certainly would not assert that if this bill becomes law and if a plate of oleomargarine is placed upon a table in an eating place, each individual would have to cut a triangular piece out of it before he could partake of it; would he?

Mr. GEORGE. No; I would not contend that. But the manner in which it is served to the individual must clearly indicate that it is margarine. If the alternative—of serving it in triangular form or shape—is used by the restaurant keeper or the hotel keeper, then my own judgment is that it must be a separate serving and must be triangular in shape when served.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, let me say that is a definite alternative.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I say that is the alternative. If he wishes to adopt that alternative, then he must identify it in the way the law prescribes. That was my understanding of the language when we passed on it.

Mr. WILEY. I have no further objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 3, beginning in line 16 and ending in line 21.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next committee amendment was on page 4, after line 19, to strike out:

SEC. 5. This act shall not abrogate or nullify any statute of any State or Territory now in effect or which may hereafter be enacted.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 5. Nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the possession, sale, or serving of colored oleomargarine or colored margarine in any State or Territory in contravention of the laws of such State or Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, that amendment was made in order to make it abundantly sure that nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize the possession, sale, or serving of colored oleomargarine or colored margarine in any State or Territory in contravention of the laws of such State or Territory. I think it is clear enough.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 3, after the word "effective", to strike out "thirty days after its enactment except that section 2 of this act shall become effective 30 days after its enactment or July 1, 1949, whichever date is earlier" and insert "on July 1, 1949."

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, that amendment should be further amended. I move that in line 6, page 5, in the date "July 1, 1949," the figure "1949" be stricken out, and in lieu thereof "1950" be inserted.

I offer that as an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, if the majority leader desires to do so, I have no objection to laying this bill aside until tomorrow morning, so the opponents of the measure may then proceed with their arguments.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, for myself and a number of other Senators, I have offered an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin has been offered, printed in the RECORD, and is the pending question.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] wishes to be recognized so that he may speak to the amendment. I understand we have an understanding that it will then go over until tomorrow.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I ask recognition so that I may speak on this amendment the first thing tomorrow. I understand that consent has been given and that the pending subject will go over until tomorrow.

Mr. LUCAS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Iowa may have the floor on the convening of the Senate tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I inquire if the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin is identical with the one which was originally offered?

Mr. GILLETTE. It is.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. There has been no change in it?

Mr. GILLETTE. There has been no change.

COMPREHENSIVE DEVELOPMENT OF INTERSTATE STREAMS

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, the critical water situation which now exists in New York City and, even to a greater extent, in northeastern New Jersey, has aroused the interest of the entire country.

As might be expected, it did not escape the attention of our ambitious Department of the Interior. On December 20 last, Assistant Secretary William Warne, in an interview with representatives of the International News Service, let it be known that the Department is interested in extending its activities in river development programs into the East.

The Interstate Commission on the Delaware River Basin, popularly known as Incodel, of which I have been a member since its creation by the States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware in 1936, took strenuous exception to this proposition.

It informed Mr. Warne, in letter of protest that, in the East, interstate agencies such as Incodel and its counterparts in the Ohio, Potomac, Hudson, and Connecticut River watersheds are doing a fully effective job in water conservation.

This whole subject is of national importance. In fact, in my judgment, the pattern which these interstate agencies are cutting out should constitute the basis for a new, and sound, national water policy.

Because of its implications, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD the following material:

First. International News Service's account of interview with William Warne.

Second. Incodel's letter of December 22, 1949, in protest of William Warne's suggestions for extension of the Department of the Interior's river planning activities into the East.

Third. Editorial in Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, December 28, 1949, entitled "No Need for Federal Control."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CRITICAL WATER SITUATION SEEN IN EAST IN 15 YEARS

WASHINGTON.—Assistant Interior Secretary William Warne predicted today that available water supplies will become critical in the East and require ambitious conservation programs within 15 years or less.

Warne forecast that the programs, mostly under Federal sponsorship, will be aimed at controlling large rivers and distributing greater supplies of water in much the same manner as western reclamation projects.

The final goal will be different, however, according to Warne. In the West, he said, Federal reclamation projects are designed primarily to boost irrigation for agriculture.

In the East, he said, the chief object will be to keep up with increased demands for human consumption and municipal requirements, including power.

Warne outlined the prospects of extensive Federal river development over the eastern half of the United States in an interview. He told International News Service:

"We don't have any new programs formulated yet for river-development programs in the East. Consideration of Federal projects in New England is still in the talk stage.

"But there will be more of them. The present situation is leading inevitably to that. Only through comprehensive development of eastern streams can you solve the problem of water supplies which will become critical."

As examples of the types of eastern rivers that might be better developed for their water resources, Warne cited the Ohio, the Potomac, the Hudson, and the Connecticut.

The Assistant Interior Chief also predicted that added emphasis will be placed soon on collecting more data about eastern water supplies and the need for flood control and control of stream pollution.

THE INTERSTATE COMMISSION ON THE DELAWARE RIVER BASIN,
Philadelphia, Pa., December 22, 1949.

DEAR SIR: I enclose herewith a copy of letter mailed today to Hon. William Warne, Assistant Secretary, United States Department of the Interior, taking exceptions to statements made by him in interview in Washington with representatives of the International News Service. A copy of the INS story is also enclosed for your information.

It occurred to me that you would find this subject of interest and news value.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES H. ALLEN,
Executive Secretary.

DECEMBER 22, 1949.

Hon. WILLIAM WARNE,
Assistant Secretary, United States Department of the Interior,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WARNE: This letter is in regard to statements reported in the press as being made by you in an interview with representatives of the International News Service, apparently on December 20.

According to the news item, you maintain it is only through ambitious conservation programs for the comprehensive development of eastern streams, mostly under Federal sponsorship, that municipal water-supply problems of the East can be solved. There is a clear inference in the story that you believe this job should be entrusted to the Department of the Interior.

I wish to register a strong objection to these theories.

I would call your attention to the fact that, in the Delaware River Basin, the States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware have delegated the task of formulating programs for the control, utilization, and conservation of the water resources of the all-important Delaware River system to the Interstate Commission on the Delaware River Basin. I know you have heard of this agency. It is popularly known as Incodel.

We are proud of the accomplishments being made under this procedure in the field of stream pollution, water-supply development, flood control, and conservation of soils and forests. Within a few weeks we shall submit to the governors of the three upper States a sound, not ambitious plan designed to meet the future water-supply requirements of the Nation's first and third largest cities, New York and Philadelphia, and the fast-growing metropolitan area in northeastern New Jersey. The areas served contain more than 10 percent of the entire population of the country. The project will have tremendous incidental benefits, some of which, under present standards used by Federal agencies, are in the national interest and would be paid for out of the Federal budget.

We welcome any advice or assistance which your Department may be in a position to offer on a cooperative basis, but we resent any impression on your part that States and their political subdivisions in this region do not have the capacity to solve their own problems.

Similarly, although on a more limited basis, existing interstate agencies are doing an effective job in water conservation in other eastern rivers such as the Ohio, Potomac, Hudson, and Connecticut.

You should agree that we here in the East, being closer to our people, are in a better position to feel the pulse of affairs than you in Washington. Nowhere have we heard any clamor for Federal intrusion in the matter of water development, either by agencies patterned after TVA or by longer established departments such as yours or the Army engineers. In fact, from what we hear, the reverse applies. The cry is for less, not more, federalism, whatever its form.

Incidentally, we would be very much interested to learn the basis for your apparent belief that the Department of Interior has the authority to exercise jurisdiction in the matter of the developmen of eastern streams. We are aware of the fact that congressional laws delegate powers to your Bureau of Reclamation in certain Western States in respect to the planning and construction of water projects for the irrigation of arid lands. Significantly, we have heard numerous complaints from these areas to the effect that this essential use is being subordinated and penalized economically in favor of an obsession by the Bureau to produce cheap public power.

I trust that the information in this letter will permit you to rest assured that any impending critical water situations in the East will be faced squarely by the agencies of Government, Federal, State, and local, upon which the responsibility falls.

I am sending a copy of this letter to the press.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES H. ALLEN,
Executive Secretary.

[From the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin of December 28, 1949]

NO NEED FOR FEDERAL CONTROL

The Interstate Commission on the Delaware River Basin has a solid foundation for its opposition to the suggestion of William Warne, Assistant Secretary of the Interior Department, that the East's water problem can be solved only through on ambitious conservation program under Federal sponsorship.

The Commission properly questions the authority of the Interior Department to inaugurate such a program, and points out that the States, through cooperative endeavor, are already doing the job along the Delaware. The cost, too, is probably less than under Federal control.

The Interior Department has little to boast about in its water policies. Its refusal to prevent pollution of Monocacy Creek where it flows through the Gettysburg Battlefield has delayed a clean-up of the Potomac, to cite only one instance.

The Interior Department does have a water job to do, but its record in the East indicates that it already has its hands full. On the other hand, effective work in water conservation and clean-up is being done by interstate agencies along such rivers as the Delaware, Ohio, Potomac, Hudson, and Connecticut.

The Interior Department can accomplish more by cooperating in such undertakings than by attempting to run the show.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE BATES, OF MASSACHUSETTS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a resolution (H. Res. 410) coming over from the House of Representatives, which was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
UNITED STATES,
January 3, 1950.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. GEORGE J. BATES, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I offer a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 199) was read, and by unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to its consideration, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. GEORGE J. BATES, late a Representative from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, in connection with the resolution I desire to say a few words. I knew the late GEORGE BATES for a great many years. I worked with him first as a member of the Massachusetts House of Representatives in the statehouse on Beacon Hill in Boston. He became an authority on municipal law. He showed courage and firmness in advocating and working for measures designed to better the conditions of and to place on a sounder basis the municipalities of our Commonwealth. He then became the mayor of the city of Salem, in which capacity he served for 10 years before becoming a Member of Congress. He served in the office of mayor with such distinction and gained the confidence of the people of his city to such an extent that he was elected as their Representative in Congress with very little opposition; in fact, as I recall, for the last two terms he served he was unopposed for the office because of the high regard in which he was held by the people of his district.

As a Representative in Congress he was very active in naval affairs. He had a very full understanding of the power and strength and influence of the Navy, and the necessity for its maintenance. He was well informed on every subject that came before Congress.

He was a devoted husband and father; and a loving wife and seven children survive to mourn his loss. A son-in-law was killed in the service of his country in World War II.

We who come from Massachusetts miss him grievously, both as a friend and as a public servant of high ideals.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I never thought it would be my lot to rise on this floor to speak about the death of the late GEORGE J. BATES. He was the Representative in Congress from the district in which I live. He was not only a public official with whom I was closely associated, but also a lifelong neighbor and close personal friend.

He started out in life under conditions of difficulty. He had to tread a hard road. His family had little in the way of worldly goods. He had to educate himself and make his way in the world by the force of his own intellect and the sweetness and the strength of his own character. He rendered a fine service in the Massachusetts Legislature, where he became recognized as an authority on different questions of government. He had a unique tenure of office as mayor of the city of Salem. He then was elected to the House of Representatives from the Sixth Congressional District, taking the seat which had been occupied before him by the late A. Piatt Andrew and the late Augustus P. Gardner, men of the highest standing, who were always able to represent that district, supported by the overwhelming suffrage of the people who lived in that section of Massachusetts.

His untimely death in an airplane accident in November cut short a career which I am convinced had a tremendous and brilliant future still ahead of it, as well as a most inspiring past. He is mourned not only by his family and friends but by the whole community of which he was a part.

The State of Massachusetts is enriched by a citizenry which traces its roots to many different ancestries and worships in many different faiths. GEORGE J. BATES was able to unite all the people of that part of the State, because he took the broad view, he took the national view, and he was never animated by small or petty prejudices. He was not only a man of intellect and of great mental force, but he was also a man of extraordinary public and civic courage. There are many occasions which I can remember when he took positions long before it became the popular or the expedient thing to do so, when he expressed opinions which cost him something, but which he felt it right to do in order to be true to his duty as a public servant.

Mr. President, we can ill afford to lose a man of his caliber, and I heartily echo the sentiments of my colleague. I hope that God may rest his soul in peace and that the memory of the service of GEORGE J. BATES will be green here in the National Capital for many, many years to come.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL].

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE GORSKI OF ILLINOIS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a resolution (H. Res. 411), coming over from the House of Representatives, which was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S., January 3, 1950.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. MARTIN GORSKI, a Representative from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, it had been my good fortune to know the late MARTIN GORSKI for a great number of years. Representative GORSKI, a native of the city of Chicago, had an excellent background and fine legal qualifications and attainments. He served the people of Cook County as assistant State's attorney and as master in chancery. In those offices of public trust he discharged his duties with unusual integrity and fidelity, which brought the plaudits of the people of the community.

Mr. President, Representative GORSKI has been in the Congress for the past 8 years. As a Member of the House of Representatives he attended faithfully to his duties and obligations, respected his oath to uphold the Constitution, and was ever aware of the problems of the people of the district which he represented. The democracy of Cook County and of the entire State of Illinois has lost a great Democrat and a true friend of the ideals of the Constitution of the United States. He was a faithful and respected member of the Cook County democratic organization. We in Cook County and Illinois mourn his loss and send to his bereaved family tributes of respect from the Members of the Senate and the House who knew him best.

Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 200) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. MARTIN GORSKI, late a Representative from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late Representative BATES, of Massachusetts, and of the late Representative GORSKI, of Illinois, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, January 5, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 4, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Edward Gardiner Latch, D. D., minister, Metropolitan Memorial—the National Methodist Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty Father, who art the creator and the sustainer of life, Thou in whom we live and move and have our being, we are the creatures of Thy hand and the children of Thy love. As we enter a new year together, we pause in Thy presence to acknowledge our dependence upon Thee and to offer unto Thee once again the devotion of our hearts. If we ever needed the leading of Thy spirit, we need it now. Grant unto us clear minds, clean hearts, and a creative faith that with real courage we can face the tasks that lie ahead. May we be equal to the trust the people have placed in us and ready for every responsibility which comes our way.

Save us from unworthy discords, keep us from perpetual motion, restrain our unruly desires. Make us worthy of the high positions we hold, give direction to our desires, develop within us understanding minds and loving hearts that the influence of our lives may always be for Thy good. Grant us wisdom, grant us courage that we fail not man nor Thee.

With all Thy blessing bless Thou our President, his Cabinet, every Member of Congress, and all their families. Fill our hearts with such loyalty to Thee and to all that is right and good that this Nation of ours may be exalted and forever be the land of the free and the home of the brave. We pray in Jesus' name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RECESS

The SPEAKER. The Chair declares a recess subject to the call of the Chair.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker at 12 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carrell, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 150. Concurrent resolution providing for a joint session of Congress on January 4, 1950.

JOINT SESSION OF THE HOUSE AND SENATE (HELD PURSUANT TO H. CON. RES. 150) TO HEAR AN ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The Doorkeeper announced the Vice President and the Members of the United States Senate.

The Senate, preceded by the Vice President and its Secretary and Sergeant at Arms, entered the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT took the chair at the right of the Speaker, and the Members of the Senate took the seats reserved for them.

The SPEAKER. On the part of the House, the Chair appoints the following members of the committee to escort the President of the United States into the Chamber: The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the part of the Senate, the Chair appoints as members of the committee to escort the President of the United States into the Chamber the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY].

The Doorkeeper announced the Ambassadors, Ministers, and Chargés d'Affaires of foreign governments, who were escorted to the seats reserved for them.

The Doorkeeper announced the members of the President's Cabinet, who were escorted to the seats reserved for them.

At 1 o'clock p. m. the Doorkeeper announced the President of the United States.

The President of the United States, escorted by the committee of Senators and Representatives, entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and stood at the Clerk's desk. [Applause, the Members rising.]

The SPEAKER. Members of the Congress, I have the distinguished honor of presenting to you the President of the United States. [Applause, the Members rising.]

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 389)

The PRESIDENT. Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, Members of the Congress, a year ago I reported to this Congress that the state of the Union was good. I am happy to be able to report to you today that the state of the Union continues to be good. [Applause.] Our Republic continues to increase in the enjoyment of freedom within its borders, and to offer strength and encouragement to all those who love freedom throughout the world. [Applause.]

During the past year we have made notable progress in strengthening the foundations of peace and freedom, abroad and at home.

We have taken important steps in securing the North Atlantic community against aggression. We have continued our successful support of European recovery. We have returned to our established policy of expanding international trade through reciprocal agreement. We have strengthened our support of the United Nations.

While great problems still confront us, the greatest danger has receded—the possibility which faced us 3 years ago that most of Europe and the Mediterranean area might collapse under totalitarian pressure. Today, the free peoples of the world have new vigor and new hope for the cause of peace. [Applause.]

In our domestic affairs, we have made notable advances toward broader opportunity and a better life for all our citizens.

We have met and reversed the first significant downturn in economic activity since the war. In accomplishing this, Government programs for maintaining employment and purchasing power have been of tremendous benefit. As the result of these programs, and the wisdom and good judgment of our businessmen and workers, major readjustments have been made without widespread suffering.

During the past year, we have also made a good start in providing housing for low-income groups; we have raised minimum wages; we have gone forward with the development of our natural resources; we have given greater assurance of stability to the farmer; and we have improved the organization and efficiency of our Government.

Today, by the grace of God, we stand a free and prosperous Nation with greater possibilities for the future than any people have ever had before in the history of the world. [Applause.]

We are now, in this year of 1950, nearing the midpoint of the twentieth century.

The first half of this century will be known as the most turbulent and eventful period in recorded history. The swift pace of events promises to make the next 50 years decisive in the history of man on this planet.

The scientific and industrial revolution which began two centuries ago has, in the last 50 years, caught up the peoples of the globe in a common destiny. Two world-shattering wars have proved that no corner of the earth can be isolated from the affairs of mankind. [Applause.]

The human race has reached a turning point. Man has opened the secrets of nature and mastered new powers. If he uses them wisely, he can reach new heights of civilization. If he uses them foolishly, they may destroy him.

Man must create the moral and legal framework for the world which will insure that his new powers are used for good and not for evil. [Applause.] In shaping the outcome, the people of the United States will play a leading role.

Among all the great changes that have occurred in the last 50 years, none is more important than the change in the position of the United States in world affairs. Fifty years ago, we were a country devoted largely to our own internal affairs. Our industry was growing, and we had new interests in the Far East and in the Caribbean, but we were primarily concerned with the development of vast areas of our own continental territory.

Today our population has doubled. Our national production has risen from about $50,000,000,000, in terms of today's prices, to the staggering figure of $255,000,000,000 a year. We have a more productive economic system and a greater industrial potential than any other nation on the globe. Our standard of living is an inspiration for all other peoples. Even the slightest changes in our economic and social life have their effect on other countries all around the world.

Our tremendous strength has brought with it tremendous responsibilities. We have moved from the outer edge to the center of world affairs. Other nations look to us for a wise exercise of our economic and military strength, and for vigorous support of the ideals of representative government and a free society. We will not fail them.

Our objective in the world is peace. Our country has joined with others in the task of achieving peace. We know now that this is not an easy task, or a short one. But we are determined to see it through. Both of our great political parties are committed to working together—and I am sure they will continue to work together—to achieve this end. We are prepared to devote our energy and our resources to this task, because we know that our own security and the future of mankind are at stake.

And right here I want to say that no one appreciates more than I the bipartisan cooperation in foreign affairs which has been enjoyed by this administration. [Applause.]

Our success in working with other nations to achieve peace depends largely on what we do at home. We must preserve our national strength. Strength is not simply a matter of arms and force. It is a matter of economic growth, and social health, and vigorous institutions, public and private. We can achieve peace only if we maintain our productive energy, our democratic institutions, and our firm belief in individual freedom.

Our surest guide in the days that lie ahead will be the spirit in which this great Republic was founded. We must make our decisions in the conviction that all men are created equal, that they are equally entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and that the duty of government is to serve these ends.

This country of ours has experienced many blessings, but none greater than its dedication to these principles. At every point in our history, these ideals have served to correct our failures and shortcomings, to spur us on to greater efforts, and to keep clearly before us the primary purpose of our existence as a nation. They have enshrined for us, as a principle of government, the moral imperative to do justice, and the divine command to men to love one another.

These principles give meaning to all that we do.

In foreign policy, they mean that we can never be tolerant of oppression or tyranny. [Applause.] They mean that we must throw our weight on the side of greater freedom and a better life for all peoples. These principles confirm us in carrying out the specific programs for peace which we have already begun.

We shall continue to give our wholehearted support to the United Nations. [Applause.] We believe that this organization can ultimately provide the framework of international law and morality without which mankind cannot survive. It has already set up new standards for the conduct of nations in the Declaration of Human Rights and the Convention on Genocide. It is moving ahead to give meaning to the concept of world brotherhood through a wide variety of cultural, economic, and technical activities.

The events of the past year again showed the value of the United Nations in bringing about the peaceful adjustment of tense international controversies. In Indonesia and in Palestine, the efforts of the United Nations have put a stop to bloodshed and paved the way to peaceful settlements.

We are working toward the time when the United Nations will control weapons of mass destruction and will have the forces to preserve international law and order. While the world remains unsettled, however, and as long as our own security and the security of the free world require, we will maintain a strong and well-balanced defense organization.

[Applause.] The selective service system is an essential part of our defense plans, and it must be continued.

Under the principles of the United Nations Charter, we must continue to share in the common defense of free nations against aggression. At the last session, this Congress laid the basis for this joint effort. We now must put into effect the common defense plans that are being worked out.

We shall continue our efforts for world economic recovery, because world prosperity is the only sure foundation for permanent peace.

As an immediate means to this end, we must continue our support of the European recovery program. [Applause.] This program has achieved great success in the first 2 years of operation, but it has not yet been completed. If we were to stop this program now, or cripple it, just because it is succeeding, we should be doing exactly what the enemies of democracy want us to do. We should be just as foolish as a man who, for reasons of false economy, failed to put a roof on his house after building the foundation and the walls.

World prosperity also requires that we do all we can to expand world trade. As a major step in this direction, we should promptly join the International Trade Organization. The purpose of this organization, which the United States has been foremost in creating, is to establish a code of fair practice, and an international authority for adjusting differences in international commercial relations. It is an effort to prevent the kind of anarchy and irresponsibility in world trade which did so much to bring about the world depression in the 1930's.

An expanding world economy requires the improvement of living standards and the development of resources in areas where human poverty and misery now prevail. Without such improvement, the recovery of Europe and the future of our own economy will not be secure. I urge that the Congress adopt the legislation now before it to provide for increasing the flow of technical assistance and capital investment to underdeveloped regions. [Applause.]

It is more essential now than ever, if the ideals of freedom and representative government are to prevail in these areas, and particularly in the Far East, that their people experience, in their own lives, the benefits of scientific and economic advances. This program will require the movement of large amounts of capital from the industrial nations, and particularly from the United States, to productive uses in the underdeveloped areas of the world. Recent world events make prompt action imperative.

This program is in the interest of all peoples—and it has nothing in common with either the old imperialism of the last century or the new imperialism of the Communists.

Our aim for a peaceful, democratic world of free peoples will be achieved in the long run, not by force of arms, but by an appeal to the minds and hearts of men. If the peace policy of the democratic nations is to be successful, they must demonstrate that the benefits of their way of life can be increased and extended to all nations and all races. [Applause.]

In the world today, we are confronted with the danger that the rising demand of people everywhere for freedom and a better life may be corrupted and betrayed by the false promises of communism. In its ruthless struggle for power, communism seizes upon our imperfections, and takes advantage of the delays and set-backs which the democratic nations experience in their effort to secure a better life for their citizens. This challenge to us is more than a military challenge. It is a challenge to the honesty of our profession of the democratic faith; it is a challenge to the efficiency and stability of our economic system; it is a challenge to our willingness to work with other peoples for world peace and world prosperity.

For my part, I welcome the challenge. [Applause.] I believe that our country, at this crucial point in world history, will meet that challenge successfully. I believe that, in cooperation with the other free nations of the world, we shall extend the full benefits of the democratic way of life to millions who do not now enjoy them, and preserve mankind from dictatorship and tyranny. [Applause.]

I believe that we shall succeed in our struggle for peace, because I have seen the success we have had in our own country in following the principles of freedom. Over the last 50 years, the ideals of liberty and equal opportunities to which our Nation is dedicated have been increasingly realized in the lives of our people.

The ideal of equal opportunity no longer means simply the opportunity which a man has to advance beyond his fellows. Some of our citizens do achieve greater success than others as a reward for individual merit and effort, and this is as it should be. At the same time, our country must be more than a land of opportunity for a select few. It must be a land of opportunity for all of us. In such a land, all can grow and prosper together.

The simple truth that we can all go forward together is often questioned by selfish or short-sighted persons. It is strange that this is so, for this proposition is so clearly demonstrated by our national history. During the last 50 years, for example, our Nation has grown enormously in material well-being. This growth has come about, not by concentrating the benefits of our progress in the hands of a few, but by increasing the wealth of the great body of our citizens.

In the last 50 years the income of the average family has increased so greatly that its buying power has doubled. The average hours of work have declined from 60 to 40 a week, while the hourly production of the average worker has tripled. Average wages, allowing for price changes, have increased from about 45 cents an hour to $1.40 an hour.

We have accomplished what to earlier ages of mankind would have been a miracle—we work shorter hours, we produce more, and we live better.

Increasing freedom from poverty and drudgery has given a fuller meaning to American life. Our people are better educated; we have more opportunities for travel and recreation and enjoyment of the arts. We enjoy more personal liberty in the United States today than ever before.

If we can continue in the spirit of cooperative adventure which has marked the recent years of our progress, we can expect further scientific advances, further increases in our standard of living, and a still wider enjoyment of democratic freedom.

No one, of course, can foretell the future exactly. However, if we assume that we shall grow as fast in the future as we have grown in the past, we can get a good idea of how much our country should grow over the next 50 years.

At present our total national production is $255,000,000,000 a year. Our working population and our output per worker are increasing. If our productive power continues to increase at the same rate as it has increased for the past 50 years, our total national production 50 years from now will be nearly four times as much as it is today. Allowing for the expected growth in population, this would mean that the real income of the average family in the year A. D. 2000 would be about three times what it is today.

These are estimates of what we can do in the future, but we can reach these heights only if we follow the right policies. We have learned by bitter experience that progress is not automatic—that wrong policies lead to depression and disaster. We cannot achieve these gains unless we have a stable economy and avoid the catastrophes of boom and bust that have set us back in the past.

These gains cannot be achieved unless our businessmen maintain their spirit of initiative and enterprise and operate in a competitive economic system. They cannot be achieved unless our working men and women and their unions help to increase productivity and obtain for labor a fair share of the benefits of our economic system. [Applause.] They cannot be achieved unless we have a stable and prosperous agriculture. They cannot be achieved unless we conserve and develop our natural resources in the public interest. Our system will not work unless our people are healthy, well-educated, and confident of the future. It will not work unless all citizens can participate fully in our national life.

In achieving these gains, the Government has a special responsibility to help create and maintain the conditions which will permit the growth we know is possible. Foremost among these conditions is the need for a fair distribution of our increasing prosperity among all the great groups of our population who help to bring it about—business, labor, and agriculture.

Businessmen must continue to have the incentives necessary for investment and for the development of new lines of enterprise. In the future growth of this country lie possibilities for hundreds of thousands of new and independent businesses. As our national production increases, as it doubles and redoubles in the next 50 years, the number of independent and competing enterprises should also increase. If the number does not increase, our constantly growing economy will fall under the control of a few dominant economic groups whose powers will be so great that they will be a challenge to democratic institutions.

To avoid this danger, we must curb monopoly and provide aids to independent business so that it may have the credit and capital to compete in a system of free enterprise. I recommend that the Congress complete action at this session on the pending bill to close the loopholes in the Clayton Act which now permit monopolistic mergers. I also hope before this session is over to transmit to the Congress a series of proposals to strengthen the antimonopoly laws, to assist small business, and to encourage the growth of new enterprises. [Applause.]

In the case of labor, free collective bargaining must be protected and encouraged. Collective bargaining is not only a fundamental economic freedom for labor. It is also a strengthening and stabilizing influence for our whole economy.

The Federal statute now governing labor relations is punitive in purpose and one-sided in operation. This statute is, and always has been, inconsistent with the practice of true and effective collective bargaining. It should be repealed and replaced by a law that is fair to all and in harmony with our democratic ideals. [Applause.]

A full understanding of the problems of modern labor relations is of such importance that I recommend the establishment of a Labor Extension Service to encourage educational activities in this field.

Another essential for our continued growth is a stable and prosperous agriculture. For many years we have been building a program to give the farmer a reasonable measure of protection against the special hazards to which he is exposed. That program was improved at the last session of the Congress. However, our farm legislation is still not adequate.

Although the Congress has properly declared as a matter of national policy that safeguards must be maintained against slumps in farm prices, there are serious shortcomings in the methods now available for carrying out this policy. Mandatory price supports should be provided for the commodities not now covered which are major sources of farm income.

Moreover, we should provide a method of supporting farm income at fair levels which will, at the same time, avoid piling up unmanageable surpluses and allow consumers to obtain the full benefit of our abundant agricultural production. A system of production payments gives the greatest promise of accomplishing this purpose. I recommend that the use of such a system be authorized. [Applause.]

One of the most important factors in our continued growth is the construction of more good, up-to-date housing. In a country such as ours, there is no reason why decent homes should not be within the reach of all. With the help of various Government programs, we have made great progress in the last few years in increasing the number of homes.

Despite this increase, there is still an acute shortage of housing for the lower- and middle-income groups, especially in large metropolitan areas. We have laid the ground work for relieving the plight of lower-income families in the Housing Act of 1949. To aid middle-income families, I recommend that the Congress enact new legislation authorizing a vigorous program to help cooperatives and other nonprofit groups build housing which these families can afford. [Applause.]

Rent control has done a great deal to prevent the housing shortage from having had worse effects during this period of postwar adjustment. Rent control is still necessary to prevent widespread hardship and sharp curtailment of the buying power of millions of consumers in metropolitan areas. I recommend, therefore, that rent control be continued for another year. [Applause.]

If we are to achieve a better life for all, the natural resources of the country must be regarded as a public trust. We must use our precious assets of soil, water, forest, and grassland in such a way that they become constantly more productive and more valuable. Government investment in the conservation and development of our resources is necessary to the future economic expansion of the country.

We need to enlarge the production and transmission of public power. This is true not only in those regions which have already received great benefits from Federal power projects, but also in regions such as New England where the benefits of large-scale public power development have not yet been experienced [Applause].

In our hydroelectric and irrigation undertakings, as well as in our other resource programs, we must continue policies to assure that their benefits will be spread among the many and not restricted to a favored few.

Important resource legislation which should be passed at this session includes the authorization of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project [applause], and the establishment of the Columbia Valley Administration.

Through wise Government policies and Government expenditures for the conservation and development of our natural resources, we can be sure of transmitting to our children and our children's children a country far richer and more productive than the one we know today.

The value of our natural resources is constantly being increased by the progress of science. Research is finding new ways of using such natural assets as minerals, sea water, and plant life. In the peaceful development of atomic energy, particularly, we stand on the threshold of new wonders. The first experimental machines for producing useful power from atomic energy are now under construction. We have made only the first beginnings in this field, but in the perspective of history they may loom larger than the first airplane, or even the first tools that started man on the road to civilization.

To take full advantage of the increasing possibilities of nature, we must equip ourselves with increasing knowledge. Government has a responsibility to see that our country maintains its position in the advance of science. As a step toward this end, the Congress should complete action on the measure to create a National Science Foundation. [Applause.]

Another duty of the Government is to promote the economic security, the health, and the education of its citizens. By so doing, we strengthen both our economy and the structure of our society. In a nation as rich as ours, all citizens should be able to live in decency and health.

Our social-security system should be developed into the main reliance of our people for basic protection against the economic hazards of old age, unemployment, and illness. I earnestly hope that the Congress will complete action at this session on legislation to increase the benefits and extend the coverage of old-age and survivors insurance. [Applause.] The widespread movement to provide pensions in private industry dramatizes the need for improvements in the public-insurance system.

I also urge that the Congress strengthen our unemployment-compensation law to meet present-day needs more adequately. The economic downturn of the past year was the first real test that our system of unemployment insurance has had to meet. That test has proved the wisdom of the system, but it has also made strikingly apparent the need for improving its operation and increasing its coverage and its benefits. [Applause.]

In the field of health, there are immense opportunities to extend to more of our people the benefits of the amazing advances in medical science. We have made a good beginning in expanding our hospitals, but we must go on to remedy the shortages of doctors, nurses, and public-health services, and to establish a system of medical insurance which will enable all Americans to afford good medical care. [Applause.]

We must take immediate steps to strengthen our educational system. In many parts of our country, young people are being handicapped for life because of a poor education. The rapidly increasing number of children of school age, coupled with the shortage of qualified teachers, makes this problem more critical each year. I believe that the Congress should no longer delay in providing Federal assistance to the States so that they can maintain adequate schools. [Applause.]

As we go forward in achieving greater economic security and greater opportunity for all our people, we should make every effort to extend the benefits of our democratic institutions to every citizen. The religious ideals which we profess, and the heritage of freedom which we have received from the past, clearly place that duty upon us. I again urge the Congress to enact the civil rights proposals I made in February 1948. [Applause.] These are proposals for the enactment of Federal statutes which will protect all our people in the exercise of their democratic rights and their search for economic opportunity, grant statehood to Alaska and Hawaii, provide a greater measure of self-government for our island possessions, and accord home rule to the District of Columbia. Some of those proposals have been before the Congress for a long time. Those who oppose them, as well as those who favor them, should recognize that it is the duty of the elected representatives of the people to let these proposals come to a vote. [Applause.]

Our democratic ideals, as well as our own best interests, require that we do our fair share in providing homes for the unfortunate victims of war and tyranny. In so doing, we shall add strength to our democracy through the abilities and skills which these men and women will bring here. I urge the prompt enactment by the Congress of the legislation now before it to extend and broaden the existing displaced persons law and remove its discriminatory features. [Applause.]

The measures I am recommending to the Congress concerning both our foreign and our domestic policies represent a carefully considered program to meet our national needs. It is a program which necessarily requires large expenditures of funds. More than 70 percent of the Government's expenditures are required to meet the costs of past wars and to work for world peace. This is the dominant factor in our fiscal policy. At the same time, the Government must make substantial expenditures which are necessary to the growth and expansion of the domestic economy.

At present, largely because of the ill-considered tax reduction of the Eightieth Congress, the Government is not receiving enough revenue to meet its necessary expenditures.

To meet this situation, I am proposing that Federal expenditures be held to the lowest levels consistent with our international requirements [applause] and the essential needs of economic growth and the well-being of our people.

I think I had better read that over; you interrupted me. To meet this situation, I am proposing that Federal expenditures be held to the lowest levels consistent with our international requirements and the essential needs of economic growth and the well-being of our people. Do not forget that last part. [Applause.]

At the same time, we must guard against the folly of attempting budget slashes which would impair our prospects for peace or cripple the programs essential to our national strength. [Applause.]

The budget recommendations I shall shortly transmit to the Congress show that we can expect a substantial improvement in our fiscal position over the next few years, as the cost of some of the extraordinary postwar programs declines, and as Government revenue rises as a result of growth in employment and national income. To further improve our fiscal outlook, we should make some changes in our tax system which will reduce present inequities, stimulate business activity, and yield a moderate amount of additional revenue. [Applause.] I expect to transmit specific recommendations to the Congress on this subject at an early date.

The fiscal policy I am recommending is the quickest and safest way of achieving a balanced budget.

As we move forward into the second half of the twentieth century we must always bear in mind the central purpose of our national life. We do not seek material prosperity for ourselves because we love luxury. We do not aid other nations because we wish to increase our power. We have not devised programs for the security and well-being of our people because we are afraid or unwilling to take risks. This is not the meaning of our past history or our present course.

We work for a better life for all, so that all men may put to good use the great gifts with which they have been endowed by their Creator. We seek to establish those material conditions of life in which, without exception, men may live in dignity, perform useful work, serve their communities, and worship God as they see fit. [Applause.]

These may seem simple goals, but they are not little ones. They are worth a great deal more than all the empires and conquests of history. They are not to be achieved by military aggression or political fanaticism. They are to be achieved by humbler means—by hard work, by a spirit of self-restraint in our dealings with one another, and by a deep devotion to the principles of justice and equality.

It should make us truly thankful, as we look back to the beginnings of this country, that we have come so far along the road to a better life for all. It should make us humble to think, as we look ahead, how much farther we have to go to accomplish at home and abroad the objectives that were set out for us at the founding of this Nation.

As we approach the halfway mark in the twentieth century we should ask for continued strength and guidance from that Almighty Power who has placed before us such great opportunities for the good of mankind in the years to come. [Applause, the Members rising.]

At 1 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m. the President, accompanied by the Committee of Escort, retired from the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The Doorkeeper escorted the invited guests from the Chamber in the following order:

The Members of the President's Cabinet.

The Ambassadors, Ministers, and Chargés d'Affaires of foreign governments.

SENATE

THURSDAY, JANUARY 5, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 4, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God of all grace and glory, so teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. In a confused day keep our minds clear and clean and uncluttered by prejudice. In a clamorous day filled with angry accents of hatred and falsehood give us ears to hear the voices that speak of justice and freedom and world brotherhood. In a mad and sad day grant us sanity of mind and spirit, purity of heart, and a glad hope which sees a shining ray far down the future's broadening way. And Thine shall be the kingdom and the power and the glory. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. GILLETTE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, January 4, 1950, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

ATTENDANCE OF A SENATOR

HARRY F. BYRD, a Senator from the State of Virginia, appeared in his seat today.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 24, 1901, the Chair designates the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR] to read Washington's Farewell Address to the Senate on February 22 next.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] is absent because of a death in his family.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], and the Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MARTIN] is absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the order entered yesterday, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] is entitled to the floor. He is, therefore, recognized.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of introducing a bill?

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, at this time I ask unanimous consent to yield to the Senator from Alabama and to other Senators who wish to introduce bills and present routine matters for the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Iowa has yielded for the purpose of transaction of routine business. It will not be necessary for individual Senators to ask the Senator from Iowa to yield for such purpose.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

REPORT OF UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION

A letter from the Chairman, United States Tariff Commission, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of that Commission for the year 1949 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Finance.

RETURN OF CERTAIN LAND TO PUBLIC DOMAIN

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to return to the public domain a tract of land known as the Battle Mountain Sanitarium Reserve, South Dakota (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

DISPOSITION OF EXECUTIVE PAPERS

A letter from the Archivist of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a list of papers and documents on the files of several departments and agencies of the Government which are not needed in the conduct of business and have no permanent value or historical interest, and requesting action looking to their disposition (with accompanying papers); to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Papers in the Executive Departments.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina and Mr. LANGER members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A resolution adopted by the Common Council of the City of Buffalo, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to repeal the excise tax on admission tickets to amusements; to the Committee on Finance.

Petitions of sundry citizens of the States of Georgia, Illinois, Pennsylvania, and New York, praying for the enactment of Senate bill 2181, providing old-age assistance; to the Committee on Finance.

A petition of sundry citizens of the State of Michigan, relating to amendments of the Social Security Act; to the Committee on Finance.

Resolutions adopted by the Sixth District Dental Society of Montana, and the Seattle (Wash.) District Dental Society, protesting against the enactment of legislation providing compulsory health insurance; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

PROHIBITION OF LIQUOR ADVERTISING—PETITION

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a letter from Mrs. C. J. Schjoll, of Monmouth, Oreg., transmitting a petition signed by sundry citizens of that city, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the transportation of alcoholic beverage advertising in interstate commerce. I present the petition for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures attached.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures, as follows:

Senator GUY CORDON,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.
Senator WAYNE MORSE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

We respectfully request that you use your influence and vote for the passage of S. 1847, a bill to prohibit the transportation of alcoholic beverage advertising in interstate commerce and the broadcasting of alcoholic beverage advertising over the radio.

The most pernicious effect of this advertising is the constant invitation and enticement to drink. The American people spent $8,770,000,000 for alcoholic beverages in 1946 as compared with $3,700,000,000 in 1942. During the same period there was a corresponding increase each year in crime. There is every reason why this expenditure should not be increased, but decreased.

LONG-RANGE PROGRAM OF ELECTRONIC RESEARCH—RESOLUTION OF COMMON COUNCIL OF ROME, N. Y.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Common Council of the City of Rome, N. Y., relating to a long-range program of electronic research.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the United States Government has made plans as part of a long-range program of electronic research to move to the Griffiss Air Force Base at Rome, N. Y., the Watson Laboratories, Red Bank, N. J.: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Common Council of the City of Rome does hereby approve of such a program and pledges the cooperation of said city of Rome to said air base as it may be from time to time enlarged; and be it further

Resolved, That the common council does hereby request the Congress of the United States and the United States Military Establishment, in the interest of economy and national defense, to effectuate the transfer of the said Watson Laboratories as soon as possible; and be it further

Resolved, That the city clerk be, and he hereby is, directed to send a copy of this resolution to the following: Louis Johnson, Secretary of Defense; W. Stuart Symington, Secretary of the Air Force; Congressman John C. Davies; and Senator Irving M. Ives, and Hon. Herbert Lehman.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL WATER POLLUTION CONTROL ACT—RESOLUTION OF BUFFALO (N. Y.) SEWER AUTHORITY

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Buffalo (N. Y.) Sewer Authority, favoring an amendment of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, relating to controlling pollution of interstate and boundary waters.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Works, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Niagara River has been described by the International Joint Commission as one of the most seriously polluted streams in the country and as such is now being surveyed by the United States Public Health Service under orders of said Commission; and

Whereas Niagara frontier communities and the Buffalo Sewer Authority are faced with the public obligation to take such actions as may serve to reduce the pollution reaching the Niagara River, and in connection therewith the Buffalo Sewer Authority has developed plans for reducing the effect of industrial wastes in the Buffalo River tributary to the Niagara River; and

Whereas the financial needs to construct the works essential to pollution abatement are of such magnitude as to impose a terrific burden upon and even invite financial crisis for the interested public bodies of this community: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Buffalo Sewer Authority, created by act of the New York State Legislature, petitions the Congress of the United States to amend Federal Water Pollution Control Act, Public Law No. 845, controlling pollution of interstate and boundary waters, and that the Congress of the United States appropriate such sums as the act and amendments would require so that funds will be available to Niagara frontier communities and the Buffalo Sewer Authority under the following provisions:

1. Change the section of the act which at present provides for loans up to $250,000 to cities, villages, and other political units to allow loans of at least $5,000,000 at an interest rate of 1 percent.

2. Change the provisions of the act to include under the term "treatment works" all works directly contributing to the abatement of an existing pollution problem in interstate or boundary waters; and be it further

Resolved, That the Reconstruction Finance Corporation be instructed to loan money at the rate of 1 percent for the above purpose; and be it further

Resolved, That the Representatives of Congress from this community and the United States Senators from the State of New York be presented with copies of this resolution and respectfully requested to see that the same receives consideration by the Congress.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

S. 2786. A bill to amend the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended, to further promote the development and maintenance of the American merchant marine, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. DOWNEY:

S. 2787. A bill to provide for the coinage of a 7½-cent piece; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. BUTLER:

S. 2788. A bill authorizing an appropriation for reprinting the 1949 Department of Agriculture Yearbook; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

By Mr. PEPPER:

S. 2789. A bill for the relief of Mrs. Gloria Pearl Crockett; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KILGORE:

S. 2790. A bill for the relief of Dr. Jen Yen Tchou; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT OF CONSTITUTION RELATING TO ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT—AMENDMENT

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

CONSERVATION AND INCREASE OF WATER RESOURCES—AMENDMENTS

Mr. DOWNEY (for himself, Mr. O'MAHONEY, and Mr. MCFARLAND) submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the bill (S. 1300) to conserve and increase the Nation's water resources, for promotion of irrigation in arid areas, by research and demonstration of practical means of producing, from sea or other saline waters, water suitable for beneficial consumptive use, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR CLYDE M. REED, OF KANSAS

Mr. SCHOEPPEL submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 201), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed to arrange for and attend the funeral of Hon. Clyde M. Reed, late a Senator from the State of Kansas, on vouchers to be approved by the Committee on Rules and Administration.

INVESTIGATION OF INTERSTATE GAMBLING AND RACKETEERING ACTIVITIES

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I submit a resolution providing for an investigation of interstate gambling and racketeering activities, and I ask unanimous consent that a statement by me in explanation thereof be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution (S. Res. 202) was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation of interstate gambling and racketeering activities and of the manner in which the facilities of interstate commerce are made a vehicle of organized crime. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for such legislation as it may deem advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to employ upon a temporary basis such technical, clerical, and other assistants as it deems advisable. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $50,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

The explanatory statement presented by Mr. KEFAUVER is as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR ESTES KEFAUVER ON RESOLUTION TO INVESTIGATE INTERSTATE GAMBLING AND RACKETEERING

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, today I am filing a resolution to authorize and direct the Committee on the Judiciary to make a full investigation of interstate gambling and to make recommendations for such legislation as may be deemed necessary.

Responsible and nationally known reporters and magazine writers have for the past several years been writing of a national crime syndicate which they allege is slowly but surely through corruption gaining control of, or improper influence in, many cities throughout the United States.

On September 14, 1949, Mayor deLesseps S. Morrison, as president of the American Municipal Association, and speaking for that association, asked the Federal Government to investigate the encroachment by organized national racketeers on municipal governments throughout the United States with the intent to control their law-enforcement agencies.

The Chicago and California crime commissions in 1949 reported the insidious influence wielded by this crime syndicate through corruption of public officials and its political and financial control.

Also, Mr. President, the mayors of several large cities, such as Los Angeles, New Orleans, and Portland, and many others, have complained in the past year of attempts being made by national crime syndicates to control and corrupt the local political affairs of their respective cities, and that they do not have adequate means to cope with this well-organized and powerful criminal organization, and have asked the Federal Government for assistance in coping with this alleged criminal aggression.

There appears to be no adequate Federal statutes which can be invoked against the activities of this organized syndicate. The resolution I am filing today would authorize and direct the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate to make investigation to determine whether there is an organized syndicate operating in interstate commerce which is menacing the independence of free municipal governments, for the benefit of the criminal activities of the syndicate, and determine and report to the Senate their findings on whether the States and municipalities can, without Federal assistance, adequately cope with this organized crime movement. The committee would also be directed to investigate the jurisdiction of the Federal Government over the activities of any criminal syndicate, and make recommendations for any necessary legislation.

The resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation of interstate gambling and racketeering activities and of the manner in which the facilities of interstate commerce are made a vehicle of organized crime. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for such legislation as it may deem advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date.

"SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to employ upon a temporary basis such technical, clerical, and other assistants as it deems advisable. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $100,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee."

AID TO PERSONS IN THE UNITED STATES DESIROUS OF MIGRATING TO LIBERIA

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD Senate bill 1880, to provide aid to persons in the United States desirous of migrating to the Republic of Liberia, and for other purposes, together with a letter dated July 5, 1949, from Ernest A. Gross, Assistant Secretary of State, to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 1880) introduced by Mr. LANGER on May 18, 1949, and the letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill to provide aid to persons in the United States desirous of migrating to the Republic of Liberia, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That it is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to cooperate with the Republic of Liberia in furthering the interests and welfare of large numbers of persons who are residing in the United States and who desire to emigrate to and settle permanently in the Republic of Liberia. It is the intent of Congress that the benefits and provisions of this act shall apply to citizens of the United States, and aliens who are lawful residents in the United States, who may qualify as eligible for citizenship in the Republic of Liberia, and who by character, physical fitness, and climatic adaptability may qualify as migrants to be permanently settled in the Republic of Liberia, and who shall have voluntarily expressed a desire to become migrants under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. The President is hereby authorized and directed to enter into negotiations with the Government of the Republic of Liberia for the purpose of obtaining the consent of that country to the migration and permanent settlement of individuals assisted in accordance with the provisions of this act. The President shall further negotiate with the Government of the Republic of Liberia to secure reasonable guaranties that safety of life and limb and freedom of action for the migrants while under Liberian rule will be assured; that the Government of the Republic of Liberia will earnestly prohibit and punish any act or acts of intolerance or persecution, either political, social, or economic, of the migrants because of their condition as migrants; and that the migrants while aliens in the Republic of Liberia shall enjoy all the privileges and immunities of any other aliens resident in the Republic of Liberia, and that, after naturalization, they shall enjoy all the privileges and immunities of other citizens of the Republic of Liberia. The provisions of this section shall be a condition precedent to other provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. There is hereby created a commission to be known as the Liberian Migration Commission, consisting of three members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice of the Senate, for a term ending June 30, 1954, and one member of the Commission shall be designated by him as Chairman. Each member of the Commission shall receive a salary at the rate of $10,000 per annum. The Commission may employ necessary personnel, including technicians, without regard to the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and make provision for necessary supplies, facilities, and services to carry out the provisions and accomplish the purposes of this act. It shall be the duty of the Commission to formulate and issue regulations, necessary under the provisions of this act, and in compliance therewith, for the migration of eligible persons to the Republic of Liberia. It shall also be the duty of the Commission to report on February 1, 1950, and semiannually thereafter to the President and to the Congress on the situation regarding the migration of eligible persons to Liberia. At the end of its term the Commission shall make a final report to the President and to the Congress.

SEC. 4. (a) Under such regulations as the Commission may prescribe, any citizen of the United States, and any alien who is a lawful resident of the United States; who is in good physical condition and is capable by reason of his training, adaptability, intelligence, and ambition of becoming a self-sustaining settler in the Republic of Liberia, and who desires to become a migrant and settler in such country, may file an application on blanks prepared and supplied by the Commission requesting assistance in migrating to and permanently settling in the Republic of Liberia. Such application shall furnish such information as will enable the Commission to properly assess and evaluate the qualifications of the applicant. If the applicant is a householder, he may make application for all the members of his household as a unit. The application of a person responsible for the support and maintenance of children under the age of 16 years shall not be favorably acted upon unless such children are to accompany such applicant on his migration, or unless he has made adequate provision for their support and maintenance pending their transfer to join the applicant in the Republic of Liberia.

(b) The following persons shall not be eligible for migration under this act: Escaped convicts or fugitives from justice, persons under indictment and awaiting trial, persons who by reason of past criminal offenses are poor risks of becoming law-abiding and self-sustaining settlers in the Republic of Liberia, persons applying for migration for the purpose of defrauding creditors, and such other persons as the Commission may reasonably believe are likely to become public charges or social liabilities in the Republic of Liberia or who are otherwise unacceptable to the Government of the Republic of Liberia. The findings of the Commission with respect to the eligibility of any person for migration under this act shall be final.

SEC. 5. (a) The Commission is authorized to lease, furnish, and equip such office space in the District of Columbia and elsewhere as it may deem necessary; order goods and services from private individuals or concerns in the ordinary course of trade; requisition any department, board, or agency of the United States for any available goods, services, or facilities which may be necessary in carrying out the provisions of this act, without affecting the proper operation of such department, board, or agency; provide transportation by land and by sea to qualified applicants migrating under the provisions of this act, and to their households, from the initial point of departure in the United States to the point of settlement in the Republic of Liberia, and to contract with land and maritime transportation companies for such purposes to the extent necessary by reason of the fact that such transportation facilities are not available from the Government of the United States; and provide adequate subsistence, medical care, and other necessities of life for the migrants during transit and until finally settled at the point of settlement.

(b) With the consent of the Government of the Republic of Liberia, the Commission is authorized to select or approve suitable sites for settlement of migrants in the Republic of Liberia; to establish and operate reception and disembarkation centers, supply depots, commissaries, temporary housing at points of settlement, dispensaries, pharmacies, and first-aid stations, and such other buildings and facilities as are necessary and proper to safeguard the health of the migrants and to carry out the purposes of this act, together with all necessary equipment and personnel.

(c) The Commission is further authorized, within the limits of such funds as may be appropriated to it, to supply tools, equipment, materials, and technical assistance and advice, to the migrants when necessary to assist them in becoming self-sustaining members of their communities; to make loans to individuals, partnerships, or corporations composed of migrants, in meritorious cases, not to exceed $1,000 in any case, on reasonably liberal terms and conditions, as initial capital for business and industrial enterprises in Liberia; and to cooperate with and render technical and other assistance to the Government of the Republic of Liberia, or its responsible agencies, in the establishment of towns and rural districts, improvement of conditions of public sanitation, construction of public works and facilities, reclamation of land, development and improvement of utilities, schools, hospitals, and transportation facilities, encouragement of business enterprise and capital investments in the Republic of Liberia, and the construction, development, or encouragement of such other public works or projects as will tend to raise the standard of living and increase the productivity of the Republic of Liberia.

SEC. 6. Such sums as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this act are hereby authorized to be appropriated.

SEC. 7. The authority conferred by this act shall expire on June 30, 1954. This act shall become effective upon the date of its enactment.

JULY 5, 1949.

MY DEAR SENATOR CONNALLY: Reference is made to a letter received from the Committee on Foreign Relations under date of May 19, 1949, requesting the views of the Department in connection with S. 1880, introduced by Senator LANGER, proposing aid to persons desirous of emigrating to the Republic of Liberia.

The bill, designed as it is to encourage the movement of large numbers of persons to Liberia, would seem to be contrary to the existing immigration policy of the Liberian Government of limiting entry to selected persons of special training or skills. This policy has been established for the very sound reason that the country is incapable of assimilating large numbers of immigrants in its present backward state of economic and social development.

In recent years, the Government of the United States has supplied, and is continuing to supply, financial and other assistance to Liberia in an effort to improve economic and social conditions in the country. Considerable progress is being made in this regard, but much more needs to be accomplished, in the opinion of the Department, before the country will be in a position to absorb any large number of immigrants.

During the past year or so, there has been a movement of small groups of West Indians to Liberia. Reports received in the Department indicate that many of these immigrants have quickly become disillusioned at conditions existing in the country and are anxious to return to their homeland or to emigrate elsewhere. It seems reasonable to assume that much the same situation would arise if large numbers of persons emigrated to Liberia under the provisions of S. 1880.

Until such time as there is a change in the existing immigration policy of the Liberian Government and a substantial improvement in the social and economic conditions in that country, the Department is of the opinion that it is highly inadvisable to encourage the movement of any large numbers of persons to Liberia as is the intent of S. 1880.

The Department has been informed by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this report.

Sincerely yours,

ERNEST A. GROSS,
Assistant Secretary
(For the Secretary of State).

Mr. LANGER. I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in full in the RECORD one-hundred-and-some-odd telegrams sent to me in behalf of Senate bill 1880. The telegrams are all worded differently.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] for himself and other Senators. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] has the floor.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, we have just passed through the Christmas holidays, and one of the fine customs of this season is the sending of greetings to our friends and receiving them from our friends. But, Mr. President, in the last week I have received over 200 Christmas cards with this type of message:

MY DEAR SENATOR: We extend to you the season's greetings: Merry Christmas and happy New Year. Hark the herald angels sing; peace on earth, good will to men—and please give your support to the removal of restrictions on the oleomargarine sale.

[Laughter.]

Mr. President, that is a prostitution of the joys and purposes of the Christmas season and is somewhat indicative of the methods being used in the consideration and the attempt to whip up public support for the pending measure.

I came to Washington 17 years ago next March. I understand that this question in its various phases has been debated some 64 times. I personally have heard debates on this question more than 30 times. I did not think there was anything new which could be offered. But yesterday the able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] offered a new argument in support of the bill, calling attention to a recent election in the State of Ohio, in which the people of Ohio, exercising their right and privilege as electors, decided in favor of giving permission for the sale of colored oleomargarine. The Senator from Arkansas took great comfort from that. I also call his attention to the fact that the people of Ohio, in expressing their viewpoint at the polls, decided in support of candidate Dewey. Whether in the opinion of the Senator that is a conclusion he supports, I do not know.

The point is that the people of Ohio and the people of Arkansas and the people of Iowa have, and should have, the right to determine what sort of articles they wish to sell in commerce, and to regulate them under the authority they have, not under an authority imposed upon them by the Federal Government.

I have been astonished, Mr. President, at the misconception which appears in the public press, editorially and otherwise, and also in the broadcasts of news commentators, as to what this issue is. My only purpose in rising at this time and discussing this matter is, if I can do so, to fix the issues which are to be determined here.

The proponents of the bill and the advocates of the sale of yellow oleomargarine say they have a palatable product. They have; it is definitely palatable; I use it frequently, and I like it.

They say they have a wholesome product—and they have. No one questions that.

They say they have a nutritious product filled to the brim with vitamins P, D, Q, and B, V, D, and vitamins of all other kinds. [Laughter.] They have; there is no question about it.

They say they have, and can put on the market, an article which can sell at a price less than the price of butter. They have; there is no question about it.

They say they should have a right to sell their product in an untrammeled way in the market place. There is no question about that, provided they sell it on its merits.

They say it can stand on its own feet, can stand alone on its merits, and should have a right to do so.

Very well; then why do not they go ahead and sell it? They say the taxes on oleomargarine ought to be repealed, and some of them have been; and our substitute measure provides that all of them shall be repealed. That is not the issue. Hundreds of letters which I have received ask me to support a repeal of the excise taxes on oleomargarine. But that is not at issue. There is no Senator on this floor or in this body who will vote at this session for a retention of the taxes on oleomargarine. We say, "Go ahead and sell your product on its merits, which it undoubtedly has. No one is preventing that."

But they say, "Oh, but we want to go ahead and color it."

We reply, "Go ahead and color it; color it pink or red or green; give it all the hues of the rainbow, if you want to."

But they reply, "No, but we want to color it yellow."

Why is that, Mr. President? Is it so that it can stand on its own merits? No.

They say, "We want to color it yellow so that it can usurp the good will and the market butter has built up over scores and scores of years."

Mr. President, there is no other purpose. For what other purpose, I ask my fellow Senators, are advertisements of oleomargarine printed in yellow—as we observe when we pick up a copy of the Saturday Evening Post or of Collier's magazine or of any other national magazine, in which there appear full-page advertisements, printed in yellow, of oleomargarine, and on which there also appear pictures of pastures, with cows peacefully grazing. Why is that done? Is it done so that oleomargarine may stand on its own merits? No, Mr. President, it is done for the sole and only purpose—and the Senator from Arkansas admitted it yesterday in his very scholarly and able address—of trying to take over a market by deluding and deceiving the people.

Mr. President, I have a formal address which I have prepared, and which I shall deliver if I ever get to it; but at the moment I wish to call attention to this bill. If ever I have seen—and I say this in all kindness—a unique bill, and one almost ridiculous to the point of absurdity, it is the proposal to which we have offered the amendment.

Let me call attention to the provisions of the bill.

The first paragraph reads:

That section 2301 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to the tax on oleomargarine) is repealed.

Fine; we are for it; our substitute provides for it.

Next:

SEC. 2. Part I of subchapter A of chapter 27 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to the occupational tax on manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers of oleomargarine) is repealed.

Fine; our substitute proposes to repeal it.

Then what does the bill say?

SEC. 3. (a) The Congress hereby finds and declares that the sale, or the serving in public eating places, of colored oleomargarine or colored margarine without clear identification as such or which is otherwise adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act—

Is unlawful? Oh, no. Is punishable under the penalty provisions of the Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act? Oh, no; not unlawful; but—depresses the market in interstate commerce for butter and for oleomargarine or margarine clearly identified and neither adulterated nor misbranded, and constitutes a burden on interstate commerce in such articles.

All right; how is anyone going to be punished for a violation of that provision? Will the punishment be under the authority of the penalty provisions of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act? Oh, no. Listen to this statement at the bottom of the page:

SEC. 407. (a) Colored oleomargarine or colored margarine which is sold in the same State or Territory in which it is produced shall be subject in the same manner and to the same extent to the provisions of this act as if it had been introduced in interstate commerce.

Let me digress here to say to the States' rights Democrats from the South that if ever I have seen a bold, bald, inexcusable instance of an attempt to violate States' rights by some sort of regulation within their borders, it is that language. Shades of John C. Calhoun, Alexander Stephens, Kirby Smith, and Sam Houston.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator from Iowa knows that these provisions were included in an effort, so to speak, to satisfy the complaint which had been made by the butter interests, and constitute no protection against the sale of margarine in a local sense.

The Senator says he is for the repeal of the taxes. I will go along with the Senator for nothing more than the repeal of the taxes, and will forget about all the rest, if the Senator and his colleagues who oppose the proposed legislation are agreeable to that. My point is that these provisions were included in an effort to satisfy the complaint—which I think was not altogether genuine—that there might be some deception in the local sales, in a restaurant. That is the only purpose of this provision. Personally, the proponents of this measure would be entirely agreeable to go along with a complete repeal of all present legislation on this subject, and nothing more, if the Senator will agree to that.

Mr. GILLETTE. I am very glad that the penitent has come to the rail; but I may remind him that the bill we are considering, of which he is one of the proponents, came to us from the House of Representatives, under the name of Representative POAGE, of Texas, that it has been considered by the Finance Committee, and reported to the Senate with these provisions. I submit to him that I have never offered them, neither have I had an opportunity to offer them. I do have an opportunity to call attention to their impracticability, their inapplicability, and their utterly ridiculous nature, as I see them.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, if the Senator will further yield, let me say that I assume that he would not wish to leave the impression that he would be in favor of an outright repeal of all Federal laws regarding margarine; would he?

Mr. GILLETTE. A repeal of all laws?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Of the Federal laws relating to margarine. Would the Senator leave that impression?

Mr. GILLETTE. That is too comprehensive a question. I do not have in my mind at the present time the provisions of all the Federal laws relating to the sale of oleomargarine.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I am referring only to section 2301; that is the first one, and section 2 of the pending bill. I merely want it to be made clear to the Senate that the Senator is not in favor of the repeal of those laws. Am I correct in that?

Mr. GILLETTE. Yes. I call the Senator's attention to our substitute, which in section 6 provides:

REPEAL

SEC. 6. The following sections of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to taxes on colored and uncolored oleomargarine, to special occupational taxes on manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers of oleomargarine, and to packaging, reporting, and other regulations of oleomargarine) are hereby repealed: Sections 2300, 2301, 2302, 2303, 2304, 2305, 2306, 2307, 2308, 2309, 2310, 2311, 2313, 3200, 3201 (26 U. S. C., secs. 2300, 2301, 2302, 2303, 2304, 2305, 2306, 2307, 2308, 2309, 2310, 2311, 2313, 3200, 3201).

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Is the Senator willing to stand on that provision, and omit the remainder of his substitute?

Mr. GILLETTE. Certainly not.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is all I want to know.

Mr. GILLETTE. The Senator knows. The question I believe is just as ridiculous as the proposal which the Senator is supporting now in the Senate. Let me go on. If the pending bill should become law, when, and under what circumstances would oleomargarine become subject to a penalty, when, in the State of Arkansas, or in the State of Iowa, or in the State of Texas, or in the State of North Dakota, it is sold in public eating places, whether produced within the State or not? I shall digress to say that, other than this, there is not a penalizing provision in the entire bill. In the first paragraph it is exempted. Section 301 of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act contains 12 provisions, each one referring to a violation by misbranding or adulterating; but there is not a single one of the 12 which applies under this bill. The proponents of the bill, recognizing that, did not attempt to work within the penalizing provisions, but said they would add something to it. Moreover, admitting under the old legal plea of confession and avoidance, that there were people who would use it as a means of fraud, the proponents of the bill wanted to avoid the penalty, and so they said, "We will add to section 301, the provision: 'The serving or the possessing in a form ready for serving of colored oleomargarine or colored margarine in violation of section 407 (b).'"

That would bring it within the penalizing provision of section 301 of the Internal Revenue Code and section 407 (b) of the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act. It means that if colored oleomargarine is being sold in Mississippi, whether produced within the State or not, anyone who sells it in a public eating place must post in a public place a notice that can be read, along with the cigarette license, the soft-drink permit, the permit for the selling of beer, and the sanitary code permit of the State, county, or municipality. They should all be displayed so that every customer entering the place would stop to read them. We know the customer will not do it. It is utterly foolish.

Proponents of the bill then do two other things that would exempt oleomargarine from a penalty. They provide that "each separate serving bears or is accompanied by labeling identifying it as oleomargarine or margarine." Yesterday I asked the distinguished Senator from Arkansas what he meant by "labeling." How is it proposed to label oleomargarine that is going to be served to prevent its coming within the penalizing clause? The Senator stated it would be very difficult to make an imprint on the oleomargarine because, by their very nature, butter and oleomargarine are prone to soften, thus obliterating the imprint. The Senator suggested it might be possible to use the label on the plate on which it was to be served. The plate might be made in China, and over the name "Royal Doulton china," or "Wedgewood china" perhaps there would be imprinted the word "oleomargarine"; or if the oleomargarine were served on a little butter patty, under the patty there would be placed on the plate so the user could clearly see it the word "oleomargarine." The user would then see that it was oleomargarine before he tried to use it. Can Senators conceive of anything more ridiculous, more impossible of enforcement?

It is further provided, alternatively, that each separate serving thereof shall be triangular in shape. I emphasize, "each separate serving." I called the Senator's attention yesterday to a custom which was formerly more widespread than it is today, of placing a plate of butter on the table along with the plate of potatoes and the plate of meat, and passing it to the guests, letting the guests help themselves. The practice is not so widespread now as it once was, but it is still followed. Does the provision of the bill mean that the oleomargarine shall be put into triangular form when placed on the table, or does it mean that as it is passed each guest shall help himself to it and shall be expected to cut a triangular piece for himself, on pain of subjecting himself to the tax? [Laughter.] I am not joking. I ask, if it were attempted to enforce such a ridiculous provision, whether Federal inspectors would go into the restaurants in Arkansas and into the restaurants in Georgia and Texas, as an army of Federal inspectors, to snoop around and watch to see whether under each little butter patty there was stamped the word "oleomargarine" or to determine whether it had first been cut into triangular form before being used in order that they might file an information under the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act? How far would they get? A survey was made in the State of Arkansas, which showed that more than 60 places within the State were violating the State provision against the sale of oleomargarine.

I turn my attention for a moment to States' rights Democrats. I sat in the Senate when we were debating FEPC, the repeal of the poll tax, and similar measures, and I have supported the States' rights Democrats. I have supported the southern Senators. I sat in that particular chair to my right when the Senators would pat me on the back as they went by and say, "GUY, you are a statesman. You are a statesman because you do not believe that the Federal Government has any right to tell Iowa that it cannot make the payment of a poll tax a condition precedent to voting any more than it can say you must make it a condition precedent. You are a hero, GUY. We are for you for standing up with the southern boys." I was here supporting the States' rights Democrats—a Democrat from Iowa, where a States' right Democrat was outside the pale of human decency—because I believed in this measure of local control. I have lived to see brother Senators—and I love them—and brother Representatives—and I know many of them and love them—come here and ask that a Federal law be placed on the statute books to authorize turning loose, if necessary, an army of Federal snoopers in the States to prosecute and convict, if possible, under such preposterous and amorphous language as that proposed, to find them guilty of selling within their own State an article which was permitted to be manufactured and sold. I did not think I would live to see it. I am disappointed that I have lived to see it. But let us go on.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. GILLETTE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does the Senator remember a dictum of Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, in one of the celebrated cases, in which Justice Holmes said, "Abstract considerations have nothing to do with concrete policies"?

Mr. GILLETTE. I thank the Senator. I do not recall the passage, but I may say it has extreme applicability to the present situation.

Let us go on with the reference to the Senators who drafted this bill; and I really should have liked to sit with them when they drafted it. Not only did they, as I have said, propose these ridiculous provisions; they went further. Mind you, Mr. President, the only way oleomargarine can be brought under a penalty provision is by subsection (b). But the proponents of the measure added subsection (c), reading as follows:

> Colored oleomargarine or colored margarine when served with meals at a public eating place shall at the time of such service be exempt from the labeling requirements of section 403 (except (a) and 403 (f)) if it complies with the requirements of subsection (b) of this section.

There was to be a labeling requirement, or it was to be required that the oleomargarine be cut into a three-cornered piece before serving. It is now to be exempted from the labeling requirement, bringing it under section 403 of the Internal Revenue Code, if it complies with subsection (b). In other words, it is unnecessary to label, as has been said. It is unnecessary to label in any way, if the oleomargarine is served in triangular form. It is a ridiculous proposal. Section 403 is the penalizing provision, which I shall read.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, while the Senator is turning to that section, will he yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. GILLETTE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I am not sure whether the junior Senator from Illinois was here a moment ago, but I should not want him to be under the misapprehension that it is the purpose of the Senator from Iowa to protect States' rights. I wanted to call his attention to section 5, on page 4, reading as follows:

> Nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the possession, sale, or serving of colored oleomargarine or colored margarine in any State or Territory in contravention of the laws of such State or Territory.

That, in other words, expressly reserves the right of each State to do as it likes about the whole matter. But the point on which the Senator from Iowa is, I think, leaving a false impression, is that the proponents of the measure are proposing Federal laws for the control of margarine. That creates a completely false impression in the minds of people who are not familiar with the legislation. We did not initiate the legislation. What we are struggling to do is to remove the existing discriminatory laws which have been maintained for 64 years by the persons who take the attitude taken by the Senator from Iowa. I mean the Senator has completely reversed the purposes.

So far as I am concerned, and, I think, so far as those who are proposing the pending measure are concerned, we should be perfectly willing to eliminate every law on the statute books relating to oleomargarine. I want to make that perfectly clear. We are not simply proposing Federal legislation in this field. We already have such legislation, which is completely unjustified. We are seeking to modify the impact of it. I think the Senator should not leave the impression that he is a States' rights man and is seeking to eliminate the Federal influence in this bill. That is not correct.

Mr. GILLETTE. In reply to the Senator from Arkansas, I will say that the junior Senator from Iowa is not seeking to leave the impression that he is a States' rights man. He is asserting that he is a States' rights man.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. But the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], from his question, had received a wrong impression as to my position and that of the proponents of this bill.

Mr. GILLETTE. I absolve the Senator from any ulterior purpose. What I have tried to do in my very inadequate way has been to point to the utter absurdity of the language of the bill as it is proposed at the present time.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator very clearly left the implication that the Senator from Arkansas is not a States' rights man.

Mr. GILLETTE. If I have left that impression, I apologize, because there have been ample manifestations of the position of my southern friends and colleagues, and I assume there will be other manifestations in the further weeks of the Congress. But I am saying that in the pending legislation, in my opinion, in my judgment, and for the reasons which I have pointed out, and others which I hope to point out, there is a clear support of the right of the Federal Government and its agents to penalize, if they can be brought within the provisions, the people of Arkansas if they do not comply with the provisions as to labeling and as to cutting the product in triangular form.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I ask the Senator if he would be willing to offer an amendment to strike that particular provision and any other similar provision from this bill?

Mr. GILLETTE. The Senator has asked me that question previously. I have no desire to perfect the Senator's bill, because I think it is absolutely ridiculous and absurd. I am joining with 25 of my colleagues in offering a substitute for it. The Senator will recall that on yesterday, when there was a suggestion of cutting the product in triangular pieces and labeling the plate on which it was served, it was said that it would be almost impossible of enforcement, and the suggestion was made that we might be willing to accept an amendment. That amendment was pending as a committee amendment at the time; and if the Senator wanted it eliminated he had a most glorious opportunity to do so at that time.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator from Arkansas has just made a very interesting proposal, which I think the dairy interests might be inclined to consider very seriously. That is the proposal to eliminate from the books all laws relating to oleomargarine. The first law to be eliminated is that which gives domestic oleomargarine a protection of 22 cents a pound against imported oleomargarine. The next to consider for purposes of elimination would probably be the law which gives producers of oleomargarine the right to fortify it, to put in flavor to make it taste like butter, and particularly the law permitting the use of benzoate of soda or other embalming materials so that oleomargarine can be made to look like butter indefinitely. No doubt there are several other laws which probably could be eliminated from the books and in which the dairy interests might show a great deal of interest.

I hope the Senator from Iowa will consider seriously the proposition of the Senator from Arkansas when he proposes to eliminate all laws on the books relating to oleomargarine.

Mr. GILLETTE. I thank the Senator. I may say that the esteemed Senator from Arkansas rather anticipated me by quoting the amendment which the Senate Finance Committee put into the bill, which provides as follows:

> Nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the possession, sale, or serving of colored oleomargarine or colored margarine in any State or Territory in contravention of the laws of such State or Territory.

Why was that amendment inserted? In the first place, we are authorizing it. In the second place, we are attempting to bring it under the penalty provisions of the law, and in the third place, we strike out the provision put in by the House, which was as follows:

> This act shall not abrogate or nullify any statute of any State or Territory now in effect or which may hereafter be enacted.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONG in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am sorry to interrupt the Senator, but he pointed to the Senator from Texas, and I want to ask the Senator what his attitude would be if the situation were turned around and this were a bill to limit the sale of milk or any other food product. Would he be in favor of it?

Mr. GILLETTE. Certainly not. I will answer that question categorically.

Mr. CONNALLY. If it referred to milk or any other food product except oleomargarine, would the Senator favor such a bill?

Mr. GILLETTE. I would not favor such a bill. Neither would I favor such a bill with reference to oleomargarine. I would not favor any restriction on any food product excepting a product which is being used to deceive the public, under laws the purpose of which is to permit the public to be defrauded. Yesterday the question was asked, "What about white cotton? What about using rayon as a substitute for white cotton?" No one can object to the sale of oleomargarine anywhere in the United States, provided the States permit it, if it is sold on its own merits. But the producers of it refuse to let it stand on its own merits. They insist on selling it as an imitation of something else, for the purpose of deceiving the public.

The esteemed Senator from Texas, whom I love, shakes his head in disappointment at my temerity in making such a suggestion. But what other purpose is there in the Food and Drug Act? What other purpose is there in any of our protective enactments than to protect the public from mislabeling, misadvertising, and misbranding? Every one of the the provisions of section 301 of the act deal with the question of misbranding and misrepresenting to the public. That is where the penalizing provisions are imposed. But because of the fact that there is not a single one which would apply to this situation, an attempt is made to bring it in by means of this abortive proposed legislation.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator knows very well that margarine was made yellow by natural ingredients, but the dairy interests were instrumental in preventing its being made in its natural color. In many parts of the country, in the Senator's own State, at this time of the year every pound of butter is colored in an attempt to deceive the people and to make them believe that the butter was produced in the summer time when it is naturally yellow. The Senator knows that very well. If that line of argument be used, it is just as applicable to butter as it is to margarine, because butter is not naturally yellow in the winter time.

Mr. GILLETTE. Butter is naturally yellow in the winter time. Before I came to Congress I milked 12 cows every morning and every evening, and sold milk and butter. I know a little about the dairy business. Butter is colored, if it is colored, for the purpose of uniformity, and not for the purpose of deceiving the public or misrepresenting the product as being something other than what it is. Of course, when cows are turned out after feeding all winter on dry hay, and they are permitted to eat new green grass, the butter is intensified in color. When the cows are fed on dry feed the butter is lighter in color. Some of the farmers do color it, especially where they have regular customers, in order to maintain uniformity. It is not for the purpose of deceiving the public, it is for the purpose of maintaining uniformity of the product.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator is apparently basing his argument on the pure motives of those producing butter. The fact is the people are deceived into thinking the product they are getting is butter produced by a cow eating green grass which gives it the color. The Senator says, "if it is colored." The testimony in every one of the hearings of the committee leaves no doubt that butter is colored. I do not know why the Senator would say "if it is colored." All the experts from the Butter Institute admitted under cross-examination that it is colored. There is no doubt about that, and I do not think the Senator wants to leave the impression that there is doubt about butter being colored.

The Senator should also make it clear that it is the only product which by special act of Congress is expressly exempted from having the statement made that it is artificially colored, which obviously leaves a doubt in people's minds as to the motives. Why do not those who produce it say on the carton that it is colored for purposes of uniformity? To be frank about it, why do not the producers of butter do as the producers of other commodities do? It is the only commodity which, merely because it has the votes in the Congress, and because it has great numbers of people back of it, imposes its will on the Congress and has itself exempted from proper labeling, a requirement which every other food product must observe.

Mr. GILLETTE. The Senator in his zeal propounded several questions to me, and I shall have to take them up one at a time. In the first place, he states that butter is colored. There is no question about that. When he says that all butter is colored, he does not state a fact.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I did not say "all butter."

Mr. GILLETTE. When he says that some butter is colored, I agree. When he makes the statement that I am supporting the contention that all dairymen are pure, I must say I am not. Being a dairyman myself, I never claimed purity even for myself. I have referred to two and a half million factories in the United States, small factories on the farms, such as the one on the farm home where I was raised, where my mother made butter and took it to town and sold it to customers every Saturday, 10 pounds. We got 20 cents a pound because of the superior quality of the butter, and that $2 was used to help dad to pay for a new harvester when he got it.

I know mother did not color the butter. We did not have any color. I know she probably would have if we had had it at that time. But what is said about the coloring is no argument and no answer. We are not trying to deceive anyone. I am merely saying that two and a half million factories throughout the United States are competing with 50 or 60 manufacturers like the Lever Bros., or Jelke, who sell 75 percent of the world product of oleomargarine. When their attempt to usurp the market is going to interfere with these two and a half million small factories, I am not willing to go to the point of letting them deceive the public.

The pending proposal would eliminate all discriminatory taxes on oleomargarine. I am for that. I am merely saying that I am not willing by my vote to permit one group of people to continue to usurp the market under the guise of legislation that does not carry within it one scintilla of possibility of prosecution and conviction.

The Senator asked if I would be willing to amend the bill. If I were going to support such a proposal, I would certainly amend it so that it would have some teeth in it. It does not even have one rotten molar with which the law could be enforced, not one, and I defy any man supporting the bill to point to how it could be enforced, and how a conviction could be secured.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. I am very much impressed with the sublime belief of the Senator from Arkansas that oleomargarine manufacturers would not attempt to have the public believe that their product was very closely related to butter, if not equally as good as or identical with butter. I wonder if the Senator from Iowa or the Senator from Arkansas, or any other Senator, can give an explanation as to why certain west-coast manufacturers sell their product in packages having on the outside a picture of something that looks like a dairy barn. Does not the Senator think it would be much more appropriate to have on the package a picture of a coconut tree, a cotton field, or even a school of menhaden or herring, or possibly a picture of a tub of lard on the outside? Would that not be more informative to the consumer? As a matter of fact, they are not required to tell the consumer what ingredients are used in the manufacture of synthetic butter.

Mr. GILLETTE. I thank the Senator, but I am afraid he has drawn a wrong conclusion. I am sure that the picture of the dairy cow which is on the package and the pictures of the dairy cow in the oleomargarine advertisement are used simply because of their artistic beauty and have no reference to deception, to make people think they are buying a substitute for butter.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I think what was stated was not a fact. I do not think any cartons carry any pictures of cows on them, and I am positive that all the cartons containing margarine carry a complete statement of their ingredients, which is not true as to butter.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to hurry on. I have not even gotten to my speech yet.

I have said there was nothing new in the discussion yesterday, but there was. My dear friend, the Senator from Arkansas, was concerned to point out to the dairy people that they were conducting their business in an uneconomic way. He produced statistics to show that the selling of milk in the form of butter, saving the cream and selling it as butter, brought less return, and that they should sell it as fluid milk in the market place. I was interested in that, and I know that the hundreds of thousands of dairymen in the Middle West will be much interested to learn that they have been conducting their affairs in such a disastrous way, and to learn that they should sell their product as fluid milk.

I would ask the Senator from Arkansas or any other Senator to supplement his statement by showing how it could be done; how, for instance, in the little town in which I live, of six or seven thousand people, with an agricultural county around it, and the limited market those families afford for fluid milk, the producers can sell their surplus milk as fluid milk.

The very thing the Senator referred to, the heavy production of milk in the spring, brings about the necessity for saving the excess production during the time of heavy production, and the adoption of the means these 2,500,000 farmers use of making it into butter, in the main, though not entirely, because some of it goes into cheese.

Again that brings us back to the main purpose of the bill.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, did the Senator ask me a question about a suggestion as to what they might do?

Mr. GILLETTE. The Senator made such a suggestion yesterday; but I would welcome a statement from him.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If they would spend on ascertaining how to can fluid milk half the money they spend on attempting to maintain the present legislation, I have no doubt they would find a way by which they could keep their fluid milk and sell it when there was a demand later.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I am sure that if the Senator had turned that thought over in his mind a couple of times he would not have given expression to it. A man who would stand on the floor of the Senate and call attention to the money that is being spent by the butter producers, in view of the record of the oleomargarine people, the representatives of Lever and the 50 or 60 men referred to, I do not believe would have referred to it if he had given it mature consideration. That is not what we would expect from the Senator from Arkansas, because he is keen and clear, but often mistaken, as he is now.

I was about to call attention to the restrictions on the sale of oleomargarine. The Senator yesterday pointed with pride to the tremendous growth in the sale of oleomargarine, so that it was the second outlet for cotton. Yet he said it was being restricted.

I wish to call the attention of the Senators from the New England States to the fact that the report of the Bureau of the Census as given to our subcommittee, of which the Senator from Vermont is an honored member, showed that in the city of Manchester butter prices between 1934 and 1948 dropped 40 percent, while the sale of oleomargarine increased 8,150 percent.

Who is objecting to the sale of oleomargarine at a lower price? I know that much of the support for this type of legislation comes from people who say, "We are being prevented by discriminatory taxes from buying an article at a cheaper figure, and our purchasing power is limited. Why can we not buy oleomargarine if we want it?" They have been deluded by the same sort of campaign to which the Senator has referred, heavily financed by oleomargarine interests who want to take over the whole market. No one is preventing people buying oleomargarine if they want it. Nothing would prevent people of the State of Mississippi doing so, under the substitute we propose. I started to comment on that a moment ago, and I wish to refer to it at this time. Listen, you States' rights men, to this language contained in the amendment in the nature of a substitute:

Provided, however, That yellow oleomargarine manufactured or colored within the borders of a State or Territory in which it is to be consumed shall not be subject to the provisions of this act—

Which declares such manufacturing or coloring to be unlawful—but shall be subject to the laws and regulations of such State or Territory.

That is the language of the substitute. It does not apply the proposed law to oleomargarine manufactured and sold within the borders of a State. But the language of the bill provides that colored oleomargarine or colored margarine which is sold within the State or Territory in which it is produced, shall be subject to Federal law in the same manner and to the same extent as though it came into the State in interstate commerce, regardless of the laws and regulations of the local State.

There is the difference between the two provisions. Enjoy yourselves, you States' rights men, but I say to you that what you now propose to do will later slap you in the face.

Mr. President, I shall never be a party to the bringing into the States a group of Federal employees in an effort to prevent the people of my State, or of other States, from enjoying something which is perfectly legal and perfectly proper to be sold within my State. I shall never be a party to penalizing my people for doing such a thing.

Mr. President, I have in my hand a sheet in which reference is made, in parallel columns, to the main provisions of the pending Poage bill and the amendment in the nature of a substitute. I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks, for the information of Senators.

There being no objection, the tabulation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Gillette-Wiley substitute amendment versus H. R. 2023

Subject	Gillette-Wiley	H. R. 2023
Federal taxes and license fees	Removes	Removes.
Reporting requirements for manufacturers and wholesalers.	Would repeal	Would not repeal.
Movement of yellow oleo in interstate commerce.	Flat prohibition	No prohibition.
States rights	States rights protected. Leaves regulation of store sale and eating places solely to the States. Each State is free to ban or not, as its desires and interests dictate.	Interferes with States rights by providing for Federal inspection and regulation of eating places in every city and town of the Nation.
Enforceability	Proven constitutional control of interstate shipments could be easily policed. Under Gillette-Wiley provisions, States could settle their own enforcement problems.	Requires expensive inspection and policing of many thousands of eating places (return to Volstead liquor law conditions inevitable).
Food and Drug Act applicability	No change	Puts jurisdiction of restaurant policing under Food and Drug Administration.
Cost of enforcement	Little or no additional cost	Estimated cost of effective Federal enforcement ranges to $60,000,000 a year or more.
Prevention of fraud	States are free to protect their consumers from fraud.	Federal Government usurps right of States to regulate sale of oleo without itself having complete power to prevent fraud.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to place in the RECORD some figures which appear in a statement I have prepared, and which I do not believe I have covered fully in my extemporaneous remarks.

The effect of oleomargarine on butter sales has been severe. In 1938 our national per capita consumption of butter was 16.4 pounds and of oleo only 2.9 pounds. Five years later, in 1943, only 11.7 pounds of butter per capita were being consumed, as against 3.9 pounds of oleo. In 1948 butter consumption had dropped to 10.2 pounds and per capita consumption of oleo had risen to 6.1 pounds.

More than 2,500,000 dairy-farm families are affected by lost butter outlets for surplus milk. More than 3,500 local creameries and 40,000 other dairy plants suffer when milk prices are disturbed, and so do their 150,000 employees. The results are felt by local merchants, businessmen, and bankers in every town, village, and hamlet in the United States.

By contrast, five giant corporations sell 68.4 percent of all the oleomargarine produced in the United States. A few months ago their total share of the business was only 61 percent, proving that these five big corporations are growing even larger. Four new oleo plants were opened between January and March 1949.

The purchase of the John Jelke Co. by Unilever, Ltd., of London, England, foreshadows still vaster concentration of oleo sales in the hands of an international cartel. Unilever manufactures 75 percent of all the oleomargarine eaten in Europe, outside of Russia, and about 40 percent of the world's entire consumption. Spokesmen of the company freely state that they plan to make the Jelke Co. the world's biggest oleo producer and to expand its operations to all 48 States.

Obviously, restrictions on the manufacture and sale of yellow oleomargarine have not handicapped free enterprise or restrained the growth of giant corporations.

Mr. President, in that connection it is interesting to note that Unilever—the Lever Bros. Co.—which has taken over the Jelke Co. and handles 75 percent of the sales in Europe and 68 percent of the sales in the United States, is the same concern which went into a United States court and asked for protection against imitation of their product, Lifebuoy soap, through coloring and shaping. The people who invoked the protection of the court of their soap product, because it was being imitated by others in color and shape, are now endeavoring to take over the market for butter.

Mr. President, again I call attention to a matter to which I adverted a short while ago, that in the State of Arkansas a survey made by Benson & Benson of New Jersey of 100 eating places showed that 68 of the 100 were violating the State law against sales of oleomargarine. The proponents of the pending bill, realizing that they are leaving a door open for fraud, have attempted to do what? Have they attempted to close the door? No, but they have attempted to shove the door a little way toward closing, and are leaving a crack through which the law can be violated, and at the same time they are jeopardizing the main outlet for a huge portion of our dairy products.

Mr. President, I am, of course, interested in expanding the market for soybeans, for cottonseed oil, for peanut oil. I happen to be a member of the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry which has spent weeks and weeks, and will spend further weeks and weeks in an endeavor to broaden the market for these farm products. But I will not be a party to an attempt to take from a portion of our people the market for their product, butter, nor will I be a party in aiding the Federal Government to infringe on the prerogatives of our local administrative agencies.

Mr. President, I urge all Senators to consider the merits of the two measures now pending before the Senate. There is no question as to the palatability, the cheapness, the wholesomeness, the nutrition of oleomargarine. There is no question that it is a product which has a right to come into the market and be sold on its merits. There is no question that the discriminatory taxes on oleomargarine ought to be repealed. We ask for their repeal. That, however, is not the main question. The main question is the protection or destruction of the outlet for small butter-manufacturing plants. The proponents of the pending bill advocate retention of means by which they can still further destroy the outlet for the small butter-manufacturing plants. I shall vote and work for the expansion of large manufacturing plants, but I shall vote even harder for the preservation and maintenance of market for our small local manufacturing and marketing plants.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. KNOWLAND obtained the floor.

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. GURNEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hickenlooper	Malone
Anderson	Hill	Maybank
Benton	Hoey	Millikin
Brewster	Holland	Morse
Bricker	Humphrey	Murray
Butler	Hunt	Myers
Byrd	Ives	Neely

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPARKMAN in the chair). A quorum is present.

AMERICAN POLICY IN THE FAR EAST

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President and Members of the Senate, within the last 90 days two catastrophic events have taken place. These are the Soviet success in atomic development, as announced by the President of the United States on September 23, 1949, and the establishment of a Soviet-recognized Communist regime in China. Only in retrospect will we be able to finally determine which event will have the most far-reaching influence. Both have set off chain reactions that have not yet run their full course.

Fifty years of friendly interest on the part of our people and our Government in a free and independent China and the overwhelming contribution made by our Army, Navy, and Air Force in the Pacific during World War II gave us the power, the prestige, and the opportunity for constructive action no western nation had ever before possessed. We could have pioneered in exporting the ideals that inspired men who loved freedom everywhere following our own breakaway from colonial status.

All this opportunity has been frittered away by a small group of willful men in the Far Eastern Division of the State Department who had the backing of their superiors.

In Europe where the record of Soviet aims was clearly outlined in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria, Hungary, Rumania, Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia we finally stood up to communism in Greece, Turkey, Iran, Berlin, and western Germany.

Knowing that communism thrives on economic and political chaos we gave economic aid through the ECA and with the North Atlantic Pact and the arms-implementation legislation, we have given moral and material support for the protection of western Europe and the Middle East from overt aggression. In that area we have given hope and support to those advancing the cause of a free world of freemen.

Munich certainly should have taught us that appeasement of aggression, then as now, is but surrender on the installment plan. Mr. Chamberlain, Prime Minister of Great Britain 10 years ago, may have sincerely thought that he was gaining "peace in our time" by consenting to the destruction of a free and independent Czechoslovakia by Nazi Germany. We know now that paying such international blackmail only increased later demands that made World War II inevitable.

The men in the Kremlin are as power hungry as the Nazis, and their system is as destructive of human liberty as was Hitlerism with which they were bedfellows while Poland was being dismembered in 1939. They have, however, learned some new techniques.

Communism is destructive of human liberty everywhere in the world. It is no less destructive in China or Korea than it is in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Latvia, Estonia, Lithuania, Hungary, Rumania, or Bulgaria. The pattern may differ slightly. In Poland the opposition leader, Mikolajczyk, was forced to flee; in Bulgaria Petkov was hanged; in Rumania the King was given a 2-hour ultimatum to change the government regardless of the constitution; in Czechoslovakia Masaryk's life was forfeited when it became apparent that coalition with communism would not work.

A Chinese official put it clearly by saying to me recently that there can be no real coalition with a tiger unless you are inside the tiger.

The President's state of the Union message of January 4 was notable for its silence on the question of China. In what we hope will be a free world of freemen does the administration have less concern with human liberty in Asia than it does in Europe? On what basis does the administration write off freemen in China?

Let me reread the cold type of the President's message to the Congress:

> While great problems still confront us, the greatest danger has receded—the possibility which faced us 3 years ago that most of Europe and the Mediterranean area might collapse under totalitarian pressure. Today the free peoples of the world have new vigor and new hope for peace.

Why no concern regarding the 400,000,000 people of China who have been dragged behind the iron curtain? International communism has already gained more in manpower and resources in Asia than it has lost in Europe, and it is on the march to even greater victories.

At a press conference this morning, the President made it clear that he backs the Far Eastern Division and Acheson policy of stopping further military aid to the Republic of China.

In Europe we have had a foreign policy in which the Republicans and the Democrats have contributed to the initiation and formulation of doctrines that are understandable. In the Far East there has been no bipartisan foreign policy. The Republicans in Congress have not been consulted in the moves leading up to the bankrupt policy which now stands revealed in all its sorry detail. The administration, and it alone, has the full responsibility for the debacle which has taken place on the continent of Asia and which day by day and hour by hour is endangering the future peace of the world and the security of this country.

As late as December 23, 1949, the State Department sent a memorandum to its overseas personnel in which they gave a clear indication that the defeatist attitude the administration has had in the past in relation to the Far East still continues.

On January 3 the wire services carried extracts of the State Department document circulated for the information of Department personnel. On the same day I requested by telephone to Under Secretary of State Webb and by letter to Secretary Acheson that a copy of the document be sent to me as a member of the Appropriations and Armed Services Committees of the Senate.

I was informed by Under Secretary Webb that the document was classified and the request to forward a copy could not be complied with at the time, but that the matter would be discussed further in the Department.

Quoting now from the wire-service report:

> Formosa has no special military significance.
> It said there are groups in the United States "who are inclined to be critical of the United States for failure to act to prevent the loss of the island to the Communists." This is "largely because of a mistaken popular conception of its strategic importance to United States defense in the Pacific," the document added.

This raises the following serious questions, to which the Congress and the American people are entitled to full and frank answers:

First. Was the American commander in the Far East, Gen. Douglas MacArthur consulted relative to Formosa's strategic importance before the State Department came to this strange conclusion?

Second. Was Admiral Radford, naval commander in the Pacific, consulted on the strategic importance of the island?

Third. Was Secretary of National Defense Johnson consulted on the strategic importance of Formosa to United States defense in the Pacific and does he concur in these State Department views?

Fourth. Is there some State Department committee now determining the strategic defense needs of the Nation and are there representatives on said committee from the Far Eastern Division which has been responsible for our bankrupt policy in China? Who are the members constituting such a committee and upon whose reports did they arrive at such conclusions?

Fifth. Were the members of the National Security Council advised of the December 23 memo when they met to consider the far eastern situation on December 29?

Sixth. If Formosa and free China were already written off on December 23, who were the State and Defense Departments trying to fool by sending Dr. Jessup on a slow boat to China and announcing that the Joint Chiefs of Staff were going out to consult with General MacArthur in February? Are both of these trips intended to be post mortems rather than consultations?

Seventh. Has the Defense Establishment or the State Department asked for or received the views of General MacArthur or Admiral Radford on the strategic importance of Formosa? If not, why not? If such views have been received, will the Secretary of State bring them to the Foreign Relations Committee when it meets in executive session next Tuesday? If not, why not?

We stood up to communism in Europe and took substantial risks in doing so in Greece, Turkey, and Berlin. Certainly for the faint-hearted the putting into operation of the Berlin airlift presented much greater risks than giving aid to the legal government of China to enable them to hold the islands of Formosa and Hainan. During the airlift we were flying our planes across territory controlled by one of the great military powers of the world. This Government supported the Berlin airlift at a cost of $254,568,800. This was not the only cost, for accidents took the lives of 31 of our men. Nevertheless, had we backed down in Berlin the Soviet Union today would have that city firmly within its grasp and might even have western Germany, if not all of western Europe. Certainly the yielding to international blackmail then would have increased the demands and made more arrogant the men in the Kremlin as an earlier yielding to Hitler at Munich increased his demands.

Our bankrupt policy has taken us to such a low point that prior to his return to the United States our Ambassador, Leighton Stuart, was confined to the Embassy compounds for weeks by the Communists. A consular official was beaten up by the Red police in Shanghai. Our consul general, Angus Ward, was restricted to the compound in Mukden for a year and more recently thrown into a common jail. Our military attaché at Nanking, General Soule, has been trying for over 4 months to get out of the Communist area and has not had any success to date.

William C. Smith, chief electrician's mate, United States Navy, of Long Beach, Calif., and Elmer C. Bender, sergeant, United States Marine Corps, of Cincinnati, Ohio, have been held captive for over 13 months. Yes; we have waited for the dust to settle, and the American people can now see the wreckage of the position once held by this great Nation in the Far East.

Our long-standing far eastern policy was first compromised at Yalta. We gave to the Soviet Union vital rights in Manchuria which were not ours to give. It was done without the consent or approval of the American Congress or the American people. It was done in violation of the open-door policy of John Hay and of Woodrow Wilson's concept of "open covenants, openly arrived at." The Yalta agreement made Soviet domination of Manchuria and other border provinces inevitable. It made possible Chinese Communist domination of the balance of continental China and has opened the door to bringing the entire continent of Asia, with more than a billion people and vast resources, into the orbit of international communism. Sitting with our American delegation at Yalta was Alger Hiss.

Following VJ-day the representatives of our Department of State persistently tried to get the Government of the Republic of China to form a coalition with the Communists. When they refused we placed an embargo against the shipments of any arms or ammunition to the legal government of the country while during those same months the Soviet army of occupation in Manchuria, as the result of the Yalta agreement, was turning over to the Communist forces large amounts of captured Japanese war stocks.

Like a person with a bad conscience, the State Department on August 6 released the China white paper. All the blame was placed on the National Government, then with its back to the wall. It was apparently issued with the hope that our own sorry part and share of responsibility might be overlooked.

That the National Government of China made mistakes, has had more than their share of Benedict Arnolds, and men who betrayed their trust needed no underscoring from us in the way and at the time it was done. Our own history also has examples of men who have betrayed their trust from Cabinet members down to ward bosses. We have also been plagued with racketeers, highwaymen, and 5-percenters at various times.

The basic objective the United States should have kept constantly in mind was to preserve a free, independent, united non-Communist China. In the postwar illness of that nation we prescribed that the strychnine of communism be taken. The State Department having contributed greatly to the Chinese disaster, still proclaims that we must follow a hands-off policy, or that we must wait for the dust to settle, or we must investigate some more. Are they preparing for a post mortem rather than a consultation?

Had China been a former enemy, like Japan and Germany, we would have been giving large amounts of supervised material help and sending many of our ablest military and civilian leaders to stabilize her currency, improve her economy, rebuild her cities, feed her people, and protect her from Communist aggression. But the State Department policy has been to abandon free China, our wartime ally and friend, to the vultures of international communism.

In and out of Government one hears the argument that the National Government of China still has a reserve of from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000 left and that they should use that rather than expect help from the United States.

Any such policy would result in the complete collapse of Chinese Taiwan or Formosa currency, for without gold or dollar backing it would have little value. A good job has been done to date in stabilizing this currency.

Britain has gold reserves of $1,500,000,000, according to Chancellor of the Exchequer Cripps, and has been receiving our aid. Does the administration have one yardstick for Europe and another for China? Are the Chinese to be required to use every ounce of gold?

In a very well-written article in the January 7 issue of the Saturday Evening Post, Joseph Alsop has this to say about State Department excuses as contained in the China white paper:

> But there is also one carefully concealed defect in the State Department argument. If you have kicked a drowning friend briskly in the face as he sank for the second and third times, you cannot later explain that he was doomed anyway because he was such a bad swimmer. The question that must be answered is not whether the Chinese did their best to save themselves, which they most certainly did not. The question is whether we did our best to save China.
> The answer to this question is contained in the strange, still secret inner history of our China policy. And this true history for which the State Department could find no room in all the 1,054 pages of the white paper may be simply, if grimly, summarized:
> Throughout the fateful years in China, the American representatives there actively favored the Chinese Communists. They also contributed to the weakness, both political and military, of the National Government. And in the end they came close to offering China up to the Communists, like a trussed bird on a platter, over 4 years before the eventual Communist triumph.

We have been getting much misinformation about Formosa. Governor Chen Cheng, who was the executive head of Formosa, otherwise known as Taiwan when I was there, had done an outstanding job. Considerable progress had been made in land reform, increase in agricultural and industrial production, and stabilization of the Taiwan currency.

There was no visible indication of insurrection or fear of it on the island. I went about the city of Taipeh both at night and in the daytime without either Chinese or American escorts. Frankly, I felt safer there than I did later in the Philippines. There were fewer police or armed soldiers doing police duty than will be seen today in most western European nations, with the exception of Great Britain.

The Governor drove about without any police or military escort. He did not act like a man who feared either revolution or an attempt on his life.

The new civilian Governor, K. C. Wu, is a graduate of Princeton. He has had an excellent record as an administrator, as mayor of Shanghai, and as wartime mayor of Chungking.

Gen. Sun Leh Jen, the ground force commander on Formosa, is also in charge of their training centers which I visited. He is a graduate of the Virginia Military Institute. I did not meet an American officer who had had experience in China and who is now in this country or overseas who did not speak in the highest terms of Gen. Sun Leh Jen. The morale of the men is excellent. The training program is very good. They do lack a sufficient supply of arms and ammunition for defense against the ultimate assault upon the island.

The people of Formosa are ably represented by a provincial legislature. Governor Wu has broadened his administration and consults with the representatives of the people of the island.

In meeting with acting President Li Tsung-jen, Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, Premier Yen, General Pai Chung-hsie, and the other responsible leaders of the Republic of China, I found no difference of opinion as to the importance of holding Formosa, Hainan, and the smaller islands, and without exception they indicated they would welcome supervision of such aid as we might send them in the same way it is supervised in Greece and in Korea.

Though there are some in the State Department who have been willing to encourage a division within the non-Communist forces of China when we should be encouraging them to pull together instead of apart, I can state that there is no rift at the present time between the acting President Li Tsung-jen and the Generalissimo.

The weakness of free China may now be her strength. By now all the Benedict Arnolds, the band-wagon jumpers, the faint of heart, and the opportunists have departed. Those who are left are determined to preserve a free, independent, non-Communist Republic of China with our help if possible, without it if necessary.

It is my firm belief that, despite the Far Eastern Division, despite the Secretary of State and the President, the Republic of China continues to have the good will and prayers of the American people in the struggle against communism.

It is a sad commentary that Britain, which itself was in such a desperate plight after Dunkerque, which joined us in complaining of Mussolini's stab in the back when France was down but not quite out, should now be contemplating abandoning the Republic of China and giving recognition, aid, and comfort to the Communists who are so closely allied with the same international Communist conspiracy that threatens human freedom in Europe.

Like Mr. Chamberlain at Munich, there are some in this country and in Great Britain who believe that by appeasing the Communists they may change their way of life. This is naive, and such a viewpoint is dangerous to the peace of the world and the security of this country.

First, the Communists will not be satisfied with mere de facto recognition. That will merely be the opening wedge for full de jure approval. When that happens, China's seat in the United Nations and on the Security Council becomes a Communist one. Every Chinese embassy and consulate in this and other western nations will become centers of Communist espionage and fifth-column activity as in the case of similar Soviet establishments. At the peace conference with Japan, the Soviet bloc will have another voice and vote to help destroy the job Gen. Douglas MacArthur has so ably done in that country.

If or when the British or the United States give them full recognition, the Chinese Communists will then consider it unfriendly unless their economic rehabilitation is financed. Such action would, of course, also increase their war potential, for electric-power development, railroads, mines, ports, and factories are important in both peace and war. The United States is the only nation capable of such financing.

Are we to be called upon to pay out substantial sums to help stop communism in Europe while financing communism in Asia—and with serious budget problems of our own? Are we to give arms and guaranties to western Europe to save that area from going behind the iron curtain while we or they accelerate the spread of communism in Asia?

It is my judgment that history will record the recognition of Communist China as being as great a betrayal of human freedom as was the pact of Munich.

I am pleased that the United States was not a participant in the Munich Pact with Great Britain. If other nations want to take that responsibility, let them do it with their eyes open. They cannot for long play both sides of the street.

Since the time the Government of China refused our suggestion to form a coalition with the Communists, the policy of the State Department has been to divide rather than to unite the non-Communist elements in that country.

It was strongly indicated through Americans holding official positions who were in China that no help could be expected while Chiang Kai-shek remained President. After he retired, the new President, Li Tsung-jen, fared no better.

The Far Eastern Division of the State Department has had no intention, in my opinion, of helping the non-Communist government of the Republic of China survive. Since it refused to collapse when they predicted it would some 4 years ago they have been more interested in saving face than they have been in saving freedom.

No group could so operate in the Far Eastern Division without the approval of the Secretary of State and no Secretary of State could follow such a policy without the approval of the President of the United States. The ultimate responsibility is there. It cannot be otherwise under our constitutional system.

But the American people should know that when the last desperate negotiations were going on, before the Yangtse River line was crossed, it was the hope of moderate Chinese elements that if a modus vivendi could be worked out with the North China Communists the troops on both sides could be demobilized except for internal security purposes, and the soldiers returned to their farms. The Communists insisted on maintaining an army of over 3,000,000 men under arms. This convinced even the moderate Chinese that this could only be for the purpose of aggression against southeast Asia or for war against the West.

There are some American and British firms that are today sending oil and other supplies to the Communist regime which strengthens it in the effort to destroy what remains of the Republic of China. I well remember, as my colleagues no doubt do also, that there were firms, with State Department approval, which supplied scrap iron and oil to Japan in 1939, 1940, and 1941. It was used against our friends in China and ultimately against the American Battle Fleet at Pearl Harbor. While at Pearl Harbor 8 years after December 7, 1941, I visited the wreck of the Arizona, which is now on the bottom of Pearl Harbor. In her hull there are still 900 American sailors. Commercial transactions paid in blood money should not set our foreign policy.

I have been deeply shocked by what I have found in the Pacific. On my responsibility as a Senator of the United States, I say to the Senate that we are far weaker in the Pacific today, 90 days after the Soviet atomic development and the Chinese debacle, than we were on the eve of the Pearl Harbor attack 8 years ago. If Formosa gets into unfriendly hands our defense Japan-Okinawa-Philippines is pierced and the Pacific coast may have to become our first line of defense.

For that to happen with the full approval of the people of the United States is one thing. For it to take place without the full facts being laid before them is quite another. Already there are those in Washington who advocate moving some of our large industries out of the States of Washington, Oregon, and California. If we are to make the Pacific coast our outpost line, this is understandable.

I do not favor such a concept when with a proper consideration of the importance of the Pacific basin and with Alaska, Japan, Okinawa, Formosa, and the Philippines properly defended and in friendly hands, we will then have the bases for a striking power with which to discourage any potential aggressor nation from taking the calculated risk of attacking us in this age of the airplanes and the atom. The administration's arms-implementation bill allocated 98 percent to Europe and 2 percent to the Pacific. This did not make sense to me when it was done, and it does not make sense to me now.

It is long past the time when the Government of the United States must give to the Pacific region the attention it deserves. It is, of course, of vital importance that western Europe with its great industrial complex and its western civilization not fall into Communist hands. It is no less important that nations containing more than a billion people in Asia not become part of the Soviet orbit. The future peace of the world and the security of this Nation may well depend upon what happens in the Far East while most of our attention is being diverted to Europe.

The question is asked "Can anything be done at this late date?" I believe that it can. While desperate, the situation is not more desperate than it was at the time of Dunkerque or Valley Forge.

First, of course, we need a foreign policy in the Far East. We have none there today. As a basis for such a foreign policy, I suggest the following:

First. That we make clear that we have no intention of recognizing the Communist regime in China at this time nor in the immediate future and that we make known to the powers associated with us that we do not look with favor upon such recognition by others.

It is of course not sufficient merely to delay our own recognition if, with a wink of the eye or tongue in cheek the State Department leaves doubt in the minds of others as to the course of action we may pursue.

Second. That we have a major shake-up in the Far Eastern Division of the State Department. We cannot expect to get inspired leadership for a new policy in the Far East from those who have been receivers of the bankrupt policy we have been following.

Third. Our policy itself, of course, will have to be set by our constitutional officers, the President, his advisers, and the Congress. Once we have a foreign policy there is great need for it to be coordinated in both its economic and defense phases. As coordinator, either Gen. Douglas MacArthur or some other comparable figure should be selected so that in that area of the world the right hand will know what the left is do' g.

Fourth. We should give supervised aid to the legal Government of China in the same way we gave it to the legal Governments of Greece and Korea when they were threatened by communism. I have never favored giving unsupervised assistance. A mission headed by a man of the caliber of General Wedemeyer could supervise the requests for aid, be sure that the Chinese Government was properly training the troops in the use of equipment, and make certain from a logistical point of view that the supplies were received at the points where they were needed.

Fifth. Unfreeze the remaining ECA funds that are available for use in non-Communist China. Much could be done to bolster the economy of Formosa and Hainan Islands with the $106,000,000 remaining unexpended. On both of those islands there is a very fine joint Chinese rural-rehabilitation program which should be continued and enlarged, as well as other steps that would strengthen the civilian morale behind the defending troops. The funds and the authority are there until February 1. It only needs implementation by the President.

Sixth. Make use of the $75,000,000 authorized and appropriated by the Congress for aid in the immediate area of China. Even this relatively small amount in the arms-implementation bill, if promptly and effectively used, could increase greatly the capacity to resist and strengthen the morale of those who want to maintain a non-Communist Republic of China. If there is a will to help there is also available excess equipment in addition to the $75,000,000 amount.

Seventh. Strengthen the American Navy in the Far East. The addition of at least two carriers, and possibly three, would do much to restore confidence in that part of the world. Just as the visit of American vessels to Greece and Turkey while the war of nerves was at its height, restored confidence in that area of the world 2 years ago. Even the executive department now realizes there has been an overdraft in our Pacific defenses.

Eighth. Make it clear that this Government will not sit back for more than a year and do nothing but send a series of notes when people representing this Government are illegally held by the Communist regime in China. Certainly, until they are all released we should undertake to see to it that no traffic was permitted into or out of Communist-held ports. They would have the choice of releasing American personnel or finding that they could not be strengthened in their war efforts through their seaports.

If we use the same courage and common sense that motivated the men who sat in the Constitutional Convention at Philadelphia there is no foreign foe we need fear, there is no domestic problem we cannot solve.

Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a dispatch in the December 23 memorandum by the State Department to its representatives overseas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ANDERSON in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TOKYO.—The United States State Department has notified its attachés that the loss of Formosa, island redoubt of the Chinese Nationalists, to the Communists was to be anticipated.

The Department said the public must be sold on the idea that the island is of no strategic value in order to prevent the loss of prestige at home and abroad.

This is "largely because of a mistaken popular conception of its strategic importance to United States defense in the Pacific," the document added.

"The loss of the island is widely anticipated, and the manner in which civil and military conditions there have deteriorated under the Nationalists adds weight to the expectation," it said.

The fall of Formosa, it continued, would threaten a loss of prestige by the United States at home and abroad "to the extent that we have become committed in the public mind to hold it.

The fall, it continued, also would threaten damage to the morale of other nations, "particularly in the Far East, which are disturbed by Communist gains and fear its possible further advances."

The document said Formosa—politically, geographically, and strategically—is a part of China and "in no way especially distinguished or important."

"Politically and militarily it is a strictly Chinese responsibility," the document said. "It is true that the technical status of the island remains to be determined by the Japanese peace settlement, but the Cairo agreement and Potsdam declaration and (Japanese) surrender terms of September 2, 1945, looked to its return to China, and the United States facilitated its take-over by Chinese troops shortly after VJ-day.

"United States public opinion has concerned itself primarily with the question of the island's strategic importance; there has been an insistent demand from a few sources for military action by the United States, but it has not assumed significant proportions."

The document said that all available material should be used "to counter false impressions" that the retention of Formosa would save the Chinese Government, and that its loss would damage seriously the interests of either the United States or of other countries opposing communism.

"Without evidencing undue preoccupation with the subject," it continued, "emphasize as appropriate any of the following main points:

"Formosa is exclusively the responsibility of the Chinese Government. Formosa has no special military significance."

Under the latter point the document mentioned that Formosa is "only approximately 100 miles off the China coast," that other potential objects of Communist aggression are closer to points on the Chinese mainland than Formosa, and that "China has never been a sea power, and the island is of no special strategic advantage to the Chinese Communist armed forces.

"In the areas of insistent demand for United States action, particularly in the United States itself, we should occasionally make clear that seeking United States bases on Formosa, sending troops, dispatching naval units, or taking any similar action would—

"(A) Accomplish no material good for China or its Nationalist regime.

"(B) Involve the United States in a long-term venture producing at best a new area of bristling stalemate and at worst possible involvement in open warfare."

Those receiving the document were cautioned to "avoid" speculation which would show "undue concern with whether the Nationalists can hold the island," references which would indicate "strategic significance or that the island is a political entity," and "statements that Formosa's final status is to be determined by the Japanese peace treaty."

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I also ask to have printed a tabulation I have received from the United States Air Force showing the total cost of the Berlin airlift.

There being no objection, the tabulation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U. S. Air Force—Estimated cost of Operation Vittles, June 26, 1948, through Sept. 3, 1949

Item of cost:	Estimated cost[1]
Civilian personnel	$27,932,700
Aircraft fuel and oil	26,749,100
Aircraft maintenance matériel	21,500,800
Communications equipment	20,000
Civilian 1,000-hour inspection	23,084,700
Subsistence	7,246,100
Clothing and equipage	1,478,900
Transportation of things	5,966,200
Engineer field operations	1,480,900
TDY, per diem and travel	384,900
Troop movements	869,400
Pay of the Air Force	48,062,200
Commercial communications	41,400
Subtotal	164,817,300
Reserve (for costs of terminating the operation and inventories)	63,856,200
Aircraft wrecked (23 C–54's and 2 R5D's at $310,000; 8 C–47's at $110,000; and 1 C–82 at $442,000)	9,072,000
Depreciation of aircraft (based on 10,321 hours life, no salvage value)	16,823,300
Grand total	254,568,800

[1] Reflects actual operating cost through July 31, 1949; estimated operating cost Aug. 1 to date and estimate for all other costs.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask to have printed at this point a letter addressed to me under date of December 31, 1949, by Hon. Herbert Hoover, former President of the United States.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., December 31, 1949.

Hon. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your request for my views on the China situation.

There is merit in the contention that the continuous pressures upon the anti-Communist National Government of China, beginning in 1943, to take the Communists into that Government contributed to the break-down of prestige and strength of Chiang Kai-shek, and the encouragement of Mao Tse-tung. Despite all this, your question still remains. What to do next?

It is my strong belief that we should not recognize the Communist Government of China; that we must continue to recognize and support the National Government; that we should, if necessary, give it naval protection to the possessions of Formosa, the Pescadores, and possibly Hainan Islands.

Among many reasons are:

(1) A wall against communism in the Pacific;

(2) The defense of Japan and the Philippines.

(3) The prevention of the Chinese legations and consulates in the United States (and such other countries as agree with us) becoming nests of Communist conspiracies;

(4) The prevention of another Communist permanent member of the United Nations Security Council, with its dangerous implications to that body;

(5) The dangers of Chinese Communist participation in formulating peace with Japan;

(6) By maintaining at least a symbol of resistance, we would have a better basis for salvation of southeastern Asia; and

(7) There would be at least a continued hope of sometime turning China in the paths of freedom again.

Yours faithfully,

HERBERT HOOVER.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask to have printed at this point in the RECORD a cablegram dated November 20, 1949, which I sent to the President of the United States from Taipei, Taiwan—Formosa.

There being no objection, the cablegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAIPEI, TAIWAN, November 20, 1949.

President HARRY TRUMAN,
The White House,
Washington, D. C.:

Strongly urge that notes of protest in Angus Ward case be implemented by action that will be understood by the law-abiding nations of the world.

First, I suggest we notify Chinese Communists via Voice of America, with information copy of broadcast to Soviet Embassy in Washington, that unless Ward and all other civilian and military personnel of the United States are released and returned to our jurisdiction within 48 hours our Government will institute an effective sea and air blockade along the entire coast line now held by Chinese Communists. Second, inform United Nations of our contemplated action and invite other member nations to join in action to restore respect for international law and order. Third, make it clear that while we welcome other law-abiding nations sharing the responsibility we are prepared, alone if necessary, to make the air and sea blockade effective against commercial ships and planes of all sizes and all nationalities. Fourth, if our responsible commanders in the Pacific do not at the moment have sufficient vessels or planes in the immediate area to carry out their mission there are plenty in Fleet and Air Reserve status to further implement what we do have in the Far East and the Pacific. If we continue to let Ward and others to be held as hostages by international blackmailers without more than words on our part we will lose what standing we have left in this important part of the world and our own self-respect as well.

WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND,
United States Senator.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed a letter I received under date of December 30, 1949, from the Economic Cooperation Administration showing their estimate of the balance of the China economic aid funds available to be $106,100,000.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ECONOMIC COOPERATION ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., December 30, 1949.

Hon. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR KNOWLAND: In accordance with your request for the present balance of funds available for the purposes of the China Aid Act of 1948, as extended by section 12 of Public Law 47 (81st Cong.), I am sending you the enclosed table which shows both the present unobligated balance of these funds and additional funds expected shortly to be made available by the reduction of certain outstanding procurement authorizations.

The procurement authorizations which will be reduced were among those issued for commodities such as cotton and rice that were programed for delivery to the Chinese mainland when, as the result of the fall, first of Shanghai and later of Canton, it became impossible to deliver these commodities to their destination. Appropriate action was taken to halt procurement, or in the case of goods already purchased or shipped, to divert them from their original destination and dispose of them by sale. Parenthetically, the greater part of the reductions which resulted from the fall of Shanghai and Canton has already been completed, and is reflected in the present unobligated balance.

The total of funds available for obligation will, of course, be reduced by any procurement authorizations issued between now and February 15, 1950. Current shipments of fertilizer and small amounts of cotton, however, are against outstanding procurement authorizations and will not further reduce the balance.

If there is any further information you wish on this subject, please let me know.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM C. FOSTER,
Deputy Administrator.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask to have printed at this point a press dispatch from the Associated Press which appeared in the Washington Post on January 4, 1950, showing that Sir Stafford Cripps says that the British gold reserve is now $1,500,000,000.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRITISH GOLD RESERVE GAINS $100,000,000

LONDON, January 3.—Britain has reversed the ruinous drain on her gold and dollar reserves since devaluation of the pound, an informed source said today.

The reserve fund which had fallen to $1,404,000,000 on September 30, 12 days after devaluation, has jumped nearly $100,000,000 to $1,500,000,000, the informant said.

The news, which is expected to be announced officially Wednesday by Sir Stafford Cripps, Chancellor of the Exchequer, increased the likelihood of an early general election.

Prime Minister Attlee could now call an election and point to the figures as proof that the economic situation is better and that Britain is over the hump.

If he delays, the recovery trend might be reversed. Already the cost of living is on the rise and is likely to go still higher as the result of the increased cost of importing food from dollar countries. Steep increases could affect the Government's popularity with the British laboring man.

Attlee's 5-year term is up at the end of July, and he must call a general election before then.

Also, other members of the sterling area—most of the Commonwealth countries, Burma, Iraq, and Iceland—have stepped up their campaigns to earn more dollars. They cheapened their money the same time Britain did. Their dollar earnings go into the British reserve fund, a common pool over which Britain presides as banker.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask to have printed an item which appeared on page 4 in Labor's Monthly Survey for October-November, a publication issued by the American Federation of Labor, under the heading "Will peoples of the Far East lose their freedom?" I ask to have the item printed in its entirety.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILL PEOPLES OF THE FAR EAST LOSE THEIR FREEDOM?

The Communist military conquest of China, now almost complete, is of immense consequence to all freedom-loving people. On the maps on page 5, the gray area shows the territory taken over by Communist armies under Soviet guidance since January 1947. On the November 1949 map, arrows show the present Communist drive to complete the conquest of China, and to penetrate and take over other countries to the south and east. Their method in these countries is to stir up discontent, promise the people great benefits under a so-called "workers' democracy," get control of unions, infiltrate the government and military forces, with the final goal of seizing complete control. In practically every country of the Far East Communist cells are at work, under the Kremlin's direction. The Communist conquest of China immensely strengthens the Communist movements throughout this entire area. The map on page 7 shows the Far East and its resources. Communist movements are at work in India, Burma, Indochina, Indonesia, the Philippines, Japan, the South Korean Republic, and elsewhere.

This area is immensely important to the entire world. These countries, overshadowed by Russia on the north and stretching from Pakistan on the far west to (but not including) Australia on the southeast, cover a land area almost four times that of United States of America and contain more than half the world's entire population. Seven times as many people live there as in United States of America. A longing for freedom and self-government has been growing among these people and in the last few years great strides toward independence have been made. In 1939, all of these countries except China, Japan, and Siam—that is, countries in which 570,000,000 people live today—were part of the British, French, Dutch, and Japanese empires. Today nearly all these peoples (537,000,000) are free and independent. India, Pakistan, Ceylon, and Burma, with their 428,000,000 people, were part of the British Empire and today are independent dominions or countries; Indonesia, with 69,000,000, was part of the Dutch Empire and today is a free nation; the Philippines, with 20,000,000, belonged to United States of America and is now independent; South Korea, with 21,000,000, was temporarily part of the Japanese Empire and is now again a free republic. Only some 33,000,000 people, in Indochina (French), Malaya and North Borneo (British), and New Guinea (Dutch and British), are still under protectorates of foreign powers. This progress toward self-government is truly remarkable.

Most of the people of these countries live under the most primitive conditions. The majority cannot read or write, so that information must be taken to them by word of mouth. Newly formed governments, lacking experience and military strength, find it difficult to deal with the Communist cells fomenting revolution and armed uprisings among their people. So the area offers a fertile field for Communist activities, which are intensified as the conquest of China proceeds. Promises of great benefits from the "workers' democracy" sound inviting to workers with such low living standards, and they cannot know what other millions have learned—that these Communist promises are false and that those who swallow the Communist bait end in slavery, poverty, and the police state controlled by Moscow.

To help these people raise their living standards and keep their freedom is an immediate responsibility, not only for the United States but for other free peoples. Otherwise they will fall victim to the Kremlin's imperialist drive.

The rich resources of this region provide the means for raising living standards there and are also vital to the entire world as raw materials. The map on page 7 shows for each country the resources which are most important in world trade. By exchanging these products for textiles, clothing, machinery, etc., from industrial countries these people are improving their living standards and can greatly increase their progress in the years ahead. They would be impoverished if this trade were broken off. On the other hand, industrial countries which send them manufactured goods cannot do without the raw materials produced there. For some materials, such as tin and tungsten, the world's main resources are in this region. For each country the map shows in bold face those products which are vital or indispensable in world trade and for which that country is the main far eastern source; in light face are shown other important products.

These materials are of great strategic importance to the United States. For instance, tungsten is indispensable for the high-speed tools on which mass production depends; 80 percent of our supply comes from China. The region where the word "tungsten" appears on the map contains the world's main resources; adequate supplies do not exist anywhere else. This region will fall into Communist hands if the Chinese Nationalist Government is defeated. Tin is essential because there is no other unbreakable material which can replace it for preserving food—a necessity for an army and for civilians. It is necessary, too, for solder and brass and bronze alloys needed to resist corrosion in machines. There are no tin deposits in United States of America; 75 percent of our supply comes from the Far East which has the world's greatest unused reserves, and without which we could not get the tin we need.

For many other products far eastern resources are an immediate need for our industries and indispensable in time of war. Steel cannot be made without manganese; radio, radar, electronics require the highest grade of mica; castor beans make an oil which will resist the low temperatures of Arctic flying and is also necessary for certain types of plastics, paints, and enamels. We depend on India for vital quantities of these products, and India in turn depends on us for machinery, autos and trucks, drugs, chemicals, hardware, and electrical equipment which we send her in return. Bauxite is the raw material for aluminum; chromite is essential for heat-resistant steels and alloys which maintain their strength at high temperatures, and cannot be replaced by any other product; graphite is indispensable for crucibles which will stand the many heatings and coolings necessary in making high-grade steel; hemp is the only known material strong and elastic enough to make high-tension ropes. Natural rubber is essential for heavy-duty tires and many other purposes, and also because we cannot afford to use up our petroleum resources in making artificial rubber. For all of these products we depend on the Far East for indispensable supplies, and these countries depend on us for machinery, iron and steel, chemicals, medicines, tobacco, fertilizers, textiles, canned milk, and other foods. Some of their mineral resources do not exist in adequate quantities anywhere else in the world. For many of the agricultural products, such as rubber and hemp, the Far East is by soil and climate especially adapted to their production. They could be produced elsewhere only after huge expenditure of capital and a period of development requiring many years.

Trade with the Far East is vital to us because we need the best materials and must have a steady supply in the immediate future. If these young nations are to keep their freedom, they need the products we send them in return and our help in developing their own industries and resources. To permit Soviet Russia to close them into her walled-off economic system, would mean poverty and slavery for them, for Russia can neither help them toward freedom and self-government nor toward the use of their resources to raise living standards.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I also ask to have printed an item appearing in the Weekly Summary of Developments, issued by the Economic Cooperation Administration, under the heading "China program." I ask to have printed what appears in paragraph (b), which shows the difficulties the Chinese Communists are now running into behind their own lines.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(b) The Communists were reported experiencing serious difficulties in effecting a smooth economic take-over of the large areas being brought so rapidly under their control. Considerable unrest was reported in Canton and other south-coast areas. Meanwhile, in the large cities of north and central China a sharp inflationary spiral in commodity prices was taking place. Rice, cotton cloth, and flour were the leading items in this rise, which soon spread to other commodities and was reflected in rising rates for the parity deposit unit, foreign exchange, and bank interest. Strenuous efforts by the authorities, particularly in Shanghai, to control this rise by dumping through state trading organizations seemed only to slow but not to check, the price rise. Poor food harvests, increased demands for commodities in newly captured areas of south China, and speculative activities of city merchants seemed to be the chief factors in the inflationary trend.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I also ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point, together with the other papers and documents I have placed in the RECORD, the letter of resignation of Ambassador Hurley, as well as copy of a letter written by me to Secretary of State Dean Acheson under date of January 3, 1950.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am grateful to both you and the Secretary of State for the support you have given me and for your kind offer in requesting me to return to China as Ambassador.

In one capacity or another I have been on the perimeter of America's influence since the beginning of the war. During the war I have served in Java, Australia, New Zealand, and generally in the Southwest Pacific, in Egypt, Palestine, the Lebanon, Syria, Transjordan, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Iran, Russia, Afghanistan, India, Ceylon, Burma, and China. Of all of the assignments China was the most intricate and the most difficult. It is a source of gratification to me that in all my missions I had the support of President Roosevelt, Secretary Hull, Secretary Stettinius, yourself, Mr. President, and Secretary Byrnes.

In the higher echelon of our policy-making officials American objectives were nearly always clearly defined. The astonishing feature of our foreign policy is the wide discrepancy between our announced policies and our conduct of international relations. For instance, we began the war with the principles of the Atlantic Charter and democracy as our goal. Our associates in the war at that time gave eloquent lip service to the principles of democracy. We finished the war in the Far East furnishing lend-lease supplies and using all our reputation to undermine democracy and bolster imperialism and communism. Inasmuch as I am in agreement with you and the Secretary of State on our foreign policy, I think I owe it to you as well as to the country to point out the reasons for the failure of the American foreign policy in reaching the objectives for which we said we were fighting the war.

I will confine my remarks in this letter to Asia, although I wish to assure you that I will be at your service in discussing frankly other phases of our international relations. I was assigned to China at a time when statesmen were openly predicting the collapse of the National Government of the Republic of China and the disintegration of the Chinese Army. I was directed by President Roosevelt to prevent the collapse of the Government and to keep the Chinese Army in the war.

From both a strategical and diplomatic viewpoint the foregoing constituted our chief objective. The next in importance was the directive to harmonize the relations between the Chinese and American Military Establishments and between the American Embassy in Chungking and the Chinese Government. It will readily appear that the former objective could not be accomplished without the accomplishment of the secondary objective as a condition precedent. Both of these objectives were accomplished. While these objectives had the support of the President and the Secretary of State, it is no secret that the American policy in China did not have the support of all the career men in the State Department. The professional Foreign Service men sided with the Chinese Communist-armed party and the imperialist bloc of nations whose policy it was to keep China divided against herself. Our professional diplomats continuously advised the Communists that my efforts in preventing the collapse of the National Government did not represent the policy of the United States. These same professional diplomats advised the Communist-armed party to decline unification of the Chinese Communist Army with the National Army unless the Chinese Communists were given control.

Despite these handicaps we did make progress toward unification of the armed forces of China. We did prevent civil war between the rival factions, at least until after I had left China. We did bring the leaders of the rival parties together for peaceful discussions. Throughout this period the chief opposition to the accomplishment of our mission came from the American career diplomats in the Embassy at Chungking and in the Chinese and Far Eastern Divisions of the State Department.

I requested the relief of the career men who were opposing the American policy in the Chinese theater of war. These professional diplomats were returned to Washington and placed in the Chinese and Far Eastern Divisions of the State Department as my supervisors. Some of these same career men whom I relieved have been assigned as advisers to the supreme commander in Asia. In such positions most of them have continued to side with the Communist-armed party and at times with the imperialist bloc against American policy. This, Mr. President, is an outline of one of the reasons why American foreign policy announced by the highest authority is rendered ineffective by another section of diplomatic officials.

JANUARY 3, 1950.

HON. DEAN G. ACHESON,
Secretary of State,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I understand that under date of December 23 or thereabouts, the State Department issued a memorandum to various military attachés and others, indicating that Formosa could not be held for long and to do evetrything possible to prepare the public for the loss of the island and to stress the fact it was not needed for the strategic defense of the United States.

As a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee and the Senate Appropriations Committee, I desire to have a copy of this memorandum at the earliest possible date.

With best personal regards, I remain,
Sincerely yours,
WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I first want to commend my distinguished colleague for his splendid presentation of this difficult problem which is facing us. I may say further that I plan to follow the Senator with a presentation next week of my own observations based on my trip to the Far East.

At this moment, however, I should like to ask the Senator a question. Does the Senator share the view with me, which I got very strongly from my study of the whole question, and especially from my trip and contacts out there, that this Communist-Chinese movement originated in Moscow some 20 years ago with a plan which was then conceived; that Chinese were taken to Moscow and trained for this very leadership; that the leadership today are Moscow-trained agents, directed now from Moscow, supplied by Moscow, and that the plan in China follows the plan under the Moscow program of the new kind of Russian infiltration into various countries of the world?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I wish to say to the able Senator from New Jersey, who is a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and who has done such yeoman service in support of our policy in western Europe, and in the Americas, that I believe he is absolutely correct, that the Communist leader Mao Tse-tung and the other leaders are taking their direction from the Kremlin; they are part and parcel of the international Communist conspiracy, and that the bill of goods which had been sold to some people for a period of years that the Communists were only agrarian liberals now stands exposed, particularly in view of the statements of Mao Tse-tung himself in July, and in earlier and later statements, and his more recent meeting with Premier Stalin in Moscow.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Would the Senator then agree with me further that while, as he has pointed out, we have taken yeoman steps in dealing with the western European situation; while we have put through the Atlantic Pact; while we have put through our program there to halt the spread of communism; in other words while we have locked the door against its further spread in Europe; yet we have left the back door wide open in Asia, and if today we should be led into the fatal error of recognizing the Communist regime in China, our far eastern policy would be completely at variance with what has been our policy in western Europe?

Mr. KNOWLAND. The Senator is correct in saying that while we have closed the door to communism in Europe we have not only left the door open in Asia, but by our policies we have accelerated the spread of communism in Asia, so that today gains for communism there have far more than offset the losses suffered by communism in Europe.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Does the Senator agree further that the recognition of Communist China, which is the key to the whole situation, would be the signal for the other nations of Asia that are wobbling on the brink to join in the procession, so that all the nations of Asia may turn to communism at our own back door?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I think it would put a premium on insurrection and revolution. It would say to those connected with the international conspiracy of communism, "If you can seize power by force of arms you will get the blessings of Great Britain and any other country that may follow her, and, perhaps, if you just hold out a little while until the heat cools off you may even get the blessing of the United States of America." I say that any such policy of recognizing the Communist regime in China either by ourselves or by those associated with us in the North Atlantic Pact undermines a basic policy we have tried to formulate to protect and to give to the world a place in which free men in a free world may live. We cannot dam up the tide of communism in Europe and let it run over its banks in Asia. Communism is just as destructive of human liberty in Asia as it is in Europe.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I agree completely with the Senator from California. I thank him for his statement. As I announced a moment ago, I hope next week to continue this debate based upon my experience obtained from my recent trip to Asia.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. May I inquire of the Senator if when he was in the Far East he visited Formosa?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes; the Senator did.

Mr. CONNALLY. Did the Senator have a personal conference with Chiang Kai-shek?

Mr. KNOWLAND. The Senator from California not only met Premier Yen, Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, but Acting President Li Tsung-jen, who at that time was in a hospital in Hong Kong; the government and provincial officials in Formosa, and the municipal officials in Chungking and Nanning and the members of their Congress, what they call the legislative Yuan in China.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am very glad the Senator saw those parties, but I was inquiring about the Generalissimo particularly.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes; I met him.

Mr. CONNALLY. Did the Senator go over with him all the questions he has discussed here today?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I did not go over with him all these questions; no.

Mr. CONNALLY. What did the Senator go over with him?

Mr. KNOWLAND. The Senator from California, when he has had private conversations with individuals who hold responsible positions in government, is not in the habit of giving a stenographic report on such conversations any more than is the able Senator from Texas. I am prepared at a later date to document any of the statements that have been made, and I shall do so.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not quarrel with the Senator's statement now, but in the course of his remarks he referred to having seen all these people.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. And inferences might be drawn from that, whether or not they are true, that the views expressed by the Senator reflected their views.

Mr. KNOWLAND. No. I think the Senator from California and other Senators on the floor have for some considerable period of time been interested in our foreign policy. I happen to speak as one who has supported the foreign policy in Europe, because I thought we had a policy which made sense and which was understood by Congress and the country. It was to try to maintain human freedom. It was to give economic rehabilitation to the war-torn nations, recognizing that communism thrives on economic and political collapse. We recognized that economic aid alone might not be sufficient. So for the first time in our history we entered the North Atlantic Pact, because we recognized in this day and age of the airplane and the atom that an act of aggression there must be of concern to the law-abiding nations everywhere, and because we have a policy in Europe that has made some sense, I have supported it.

But we have had no such policy in Asia, and to the contrary, the record is very clear that the policies followed by this Government have run counter to the policies we follow in Europe. We have actually urged on the Republic of China to take Communists into their Government. We tried to force them to do it by withholding arms and ammunition from them at the very time the Soviet army of occupation was giving arms and ammunition to the Communist forces there. We issued the white paper when they had their backs to the wall. We have followed a policy in Asia which is destructive of our policy in Europe.

Mr. CONNALLY. Did the Senator oppose the mission of General Marshall when he was in China?

Mr. KNOWLAND. The Senator from California was not a Member of the Senate of the United States all of that time. He happened to have been in the Army, in the European theater of operations.

Mr. CONNALLY. He had some views on the subject, did he not? He did not stay in the Army? He came out of the Army.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I came into the Senate in September 1945.

Mr. CONNALLY. But General Marshall was over there at a later period, was he not?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I did not favor the views of General Marshall in trying to form a coalition with the Communists.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. I wonder if the Senator could shed some light on a certain subject. I read in a local newspaper a short time ago that the man in charge of promotions or placements in one branch of the State Department is named John Service, the same John Service who in 1944, according to Gen. Patrick Hurley's papers, advocated that we torpedo Chiang Kai-shek, and who officially as a representative of the State Department said that the only hope of Asia was communism. The same John Service was later picked up by the FBI on charges of espionage. He was not tried, he was not convicted, but was brought home, promoted, and put in charge of personnel and placement in the State Department.

As I said, I read this in a local newspaper, the Times-Herald, and I wonder if the Senator could shed any light on that particular situation, as to whether or not the situation still exists, in other words, whether this man, John Service, who in 1944 said, "Let us scuttle Chiang Kai-shek" and who said the only hope of Asia is communism, this man who was picked up by the FBI, for espionage, who was accused of having had a sizable number of secret documents in his possession which he was handing over to the Communists, is still in charge of personnel and placement, as he apparently was about a month ago when the article appeared in the newspaper?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I cannot throw any light on the Senator's statement at this time. I should like to have printed in the RECORD, however, a letter of resignation submitted by Ambassador Hurley at the time, in which he points out that some of the persons he had removed from the China area in the State Department he later found to be issuing instructions from the Far Eastern Division. I do that without any relation to the Senator's statement, but I think the letter of Mr. Hurley will speak for itself.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will further yield——

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ANDERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I wish first to compliment the Senator from California for giving this timely report on some of his findings in the Pacific. Having spent some time in some of the same places the Senator from California has visited, I should like to make certain inquiries.

The Senator has indicated that our policy, as announced at the time of sending General Marshall to China, was that China was to take into its Government certain Communists and make a coalition of the Communists and the National Government. I wish to ask the Senator whether he found evidence in the Far East that we had the same policy in relation to Korea, namely that the Koreans, too, were advised that the policy of the United States was that they should and must take Communists into their Government when it was formed.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I may say to the Senator that I have been advised, on what I believe to be reliable authority, that the American authorities in Korea, at the time when a provisional government was getting ready to be established there, urged that Communists be taken into the Korean Government, and even went to the extent of offering to give the Communists 40 percent of the strength in the Government. However, I understood that the Communists rejected that offer, because they wanted at least 51 percent. I think that is a matter to which the Foreign Relations Committee and other proper committees should give further study in order to get the facts.

Mr. FERGUSON. I should like to ask another question. Is the Senator satisfied, from evidence received, that that was our policy?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Based upon information which the Senator from Michigan has, and which I received while I was there, I think it has a substantial foundation in fact.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, to permit me to ask a few more questions?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator from California has indicated that he has a memorandum from the United Press as to a memorandum dated December 23, sent to our various embassies and Foreign Service officials in the Far East; and he has offered that press release as a part of the RECORD. He also has indicated that he has asked the State Department for a copy of the original document, so that he and the Senate as a whole might be advised regarding the exact text of that memorandum. Can the Senator advise whether up to this time the State Department has furnished that document to him or has given him evidence on that point?

Mr. KNOWLAND. In answer to the Senator's question, I say that on January 3, the day the wire services carried the story from Tokyo, I wrote Secretary Acheson the following letter:

> DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I understand that under date of December 23, or thereabouts, the State Department issued a memorandum to various military attachés and others indicating that Formosa could not be held for long, and to do everything possible to prepare the Americans for the loss of the island, and to stress the fact that it was not needed for the strategic defense of the United States. As a member of the Senate Armed Service Committee and the Senate Appropriations Committee, I desire to have a copy of this memorandum at the earliest possible date.
> With best personal regards, I am,
> Sincerely yours.

I will say that in addition to that, I talked with Under Secretary Webb over the telephone. Under Secretary Webb, as I mentioned in my remarks a few minutes ago, said that he believed the document was a classified document for the information of Foreign Service and other official personnel overseas. He did not undertake to say that I could not have the document, but at the same time he did not say that I could have it.

Subsequent to that, I had a call from Mr. Webb, saying that he thought he could arrange for me to see the document, but that it could not be sent. I told him that would not satisfy my request, under the circumstances.

This morning the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] and I had a conference lasting an hour and a half with the Secretary of State. I do not intend to go into that at this time, obviously. But I think that is indicative of the history of this matter.

I have not yet received a copy of the document. I wish to compliment the American wire services, because I think they have done more to keep the American public informed about foreign policy and other matters upon which they are entitled to information than the policy followed by the State Department—the policy of lowering an iron curtain between their activities and the Congress and the country—has done. Based upon that document and upon what I believe to be an accurate representation of what was in it—in which it is flat-footedly stated that Formosa has no strategic value—I have raised this question on the floor of the Senate, and I shall raise it again and again: Upon what do they base the statement that Formosa has no strategic value? Have they received any such information from General MacArthur? Have they received any such information from Admiral Radford? Have they received any such information, indeed, from the Joint Chiefs of Staff?

It is my opinion that they have received no such information, and that to that extent it is a misleading document, which has been sent to our State Department representatives overseas.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator from California has indicated that he has spoken to certain men in the Pacific, including the general in charge of Japan, General MacArthur; and the Senator has also named Admiral Radford and others with whom the Senator has conferred. Would the Senator be able to state to the Senate whether, so far as his knowledge is concerned, we had, at the time when the Senator spoke to those men, a foreign policy in the Pacific?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I would say to the Senator that there is no doubt in my mind that the responsible commanders in the Pacific are greatly concerned lest Formosa fall into unfriendly hands.

Mr. FERGUSON. In other words, not wishing to quote or not quoting exactly the language of the men who are in charge of our defense of the Pacific, the Senator from California would say to the Senate today that he did not find in the Pacific evidence, as indicated in the document dated December 23, that Formosa is not of any strategic value to the United States of America?

Mr. KNOWLAND. To the contrary, upon my responsibility as a Senator of the United States, it is my judgment that the responsible commanders in that area of the world feel that Formosa is a very strategic island and that its loss into unfriendly hands would be detrimental to the American defense in the Pacific.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is that the reason why the Senator from California has stated that if Formosa is lost, then we might expect that the defense line would move to the Pacific coast, as the Senator has indicated?

Mr. KNOWLAND. It would certainly greatly weaken the American defense position in that part of the world, if Formosa should fall into unfriendly hands.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONG in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to commend the Senator from California for his very well phrased and carefully thought out statement on a subject of the highest importance. Without necessarily agreeing with all the Senator's contentions or his conclusions, I should like to assure him that, as one Member of the Senate and as one member of the Foreign Relations Committee, I feel that his contentions are entitled to categorical answers by the State Department, and I shall do whatever I can to see that those categorical answers are obtained.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Of course, I was very much interested in what the Senator from California had to say, because on many occasions he and I have come to some area of agreement on these matters. But it seems to me that, even agreeing with the conclusions reached by the Senator, we somewhat miss the point in regard to this question of international policy. I wish to ask the Senator a very serious question in regard to the enigma of China. I know a little, personally, about the Orient. Is the Senator from California convinced that this upheaval in China is not literally a civil war?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Of course it is a civil war, in the sense that there have been Chinese fighting Chinese, with one group of Chinese led by Moscow-trained Communist leaders——

Mr. MAGNUSON. There is no question about that.

Mr. KNOWLAND. And the other group under the Nationalist Government of China. To that extent, if that is a definition of civil war, certainly there has been civil war going on there.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Then I wish to ask the Senator another question: Is he convinced that if it were possible to leave Russia out of the equation——

Mr. KNOWLAND. But it is not possible to leave Russia out of it.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Is the Senator convinced that this would not have happened in China, regardless of Russia or regardless of the communistic influences the Senator has suggested in his speech?

Mr. KNOWLAND. No; I would not say that in that country or any other countries there would not have been certain upheavals, as there have been from time to time in certain South American countries and in Mexico and other countries, before stability reached those areas of the world. But I say there is a vast difference between a fight between two local groups, each trying to obtain control, and finally one of those groups triumphs and obtains the possession of power in that country, and the kind of fight we have witnessed in China. A fight between two strictly local or strictly national groups is one thing, but it is quite another thing when communism is on the march and is using, not the tactics of Hitler but the new technique of taking a country from within. The people of Czechoslovakia are just as enslaved under the Communist regime as they were under the Hitlerian regime. Of course, I say that under the Communists there were not to date any overt Soviet invasions across the border; but a man like Petkov, who was hanged, is just as dead as if he had been hanged by the Nazis. So in that respect there is no difference.

Yet international communism has been able to make its advance, so that now international communism has an aggregate of power just as great, if not considerably greater, than Hitler, Tojo, and Mussolini had at the height of their power.

It has been the viewpoint of the Senator from California, who has supported the United Nations and the international effort to preserve the peace of the world, that our best chance of preserving the peace of the world would be to assure the law-abiding nations a sufficient amount of power so that no potential aggressor nation would feel that his calculated risk of winning was greater than his calculated risk of losing. But, once the 13 men of the Kremlin, who are not dependent upon public opinion, feel that their chance of winning is greater than that of losing, that period is, I think, a great danger period for the peace of the world, and certainly the attitude we have taken in Asia of constantly retreating before communism does not serve the cause of world peace anymore than Mr. Chamberlain's position at Munich served the peace of the world, because appeasement, then and now, as I pointed out, and as was so ably demonstrated by the Senator from Michigan, is but surrender on the installment plan. So, I think those facts must be kept in mind, and we must realize that we are dealing with an international conspiracy to destroy the liberty of free people everywhere.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I do not disagree with the Senator on that at all, but it seems to me again we are missing the real issue here. If the conclusion of the Senator is correct that we have retreated, the decision might have been that we were retreating from the frying pan into the fire, no matter which way we moved in China, affirmatively or negatively. It seems to me even granting all the Senator says to be correct—and I know the facts he states are correct—we may disagree on conclusions, but we have got to talk about the other side when we make a decision. I presume that facts could be gathered—in fact I know they could be—which would be just damning of the nationalistic government as of the Communist government.

I think we face a problem in connection with which we must consider both sides, and what they have done. I recommend to the Senator a book that has just been published called China Shakes the World, by a very noted Chinese oriental correspondent by the name of Jack Belden, in which the same damning evidence appears. Of course, we do not want a Communist-dominated government anywhere in the world, but it is a question of making a choice in some instances, when we have to determine a policy.

What bothers me seriously is that in this matter we are between the devil and the deep blue sea. I assume the facts to be as stated in both instances. I do not disagree with the Senator. He and I have agreed on many things. I do not disagree with him in regard to the military importance of the Pacific. I know a little bit about that, too. But the question of policy in the Far East must necessarily involve a discussion of those who now have control of the great geographical areas of China. I think that is the meat of the coconut.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I do not quite agree with the Senator that that is the meat of the coconut. I tried to stress in the remarks I previously made——

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, may I interrupt further?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I do not know; I am not so positive in my conclusions as is the Senator from California. I wish I knew. Probably Mr. Truman would make me Secretary of State if I knew the answer. But it seems to me that in any discussion, anyone who knew the answer would be valuable to this country in respect to its foreign policy. I do not know, but it seems to me that all our discussions are one-sided on this matter.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I may say to the Senator that certainly the Senator from California recognizes that this is a very complex problem.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Yes; I know that.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The Far East has always been a very complex problem. But we also are faced with the fact that communism is overrunning the land mass of Asia. I do not happen to believe that that is in the best interests of the peace of the world or of the security of this Nation.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Nor do I.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The Senator and I live on the Pacific coast. We saw a nation of about 75,000,000 people—Japan—which is relatively small compared with the land mass of Asia, drive the United States out of the Philippines, out of Guam, out of Wake; strike us almost a mortal blow at Pearl Harbor; move in through the Aleutians, and take some of our own territory, and actually occupy a position where they could make some minor raids upon the Pacific coast. That same nation of 75,000,000 people chased the British Empire completely out of the Pacific, except for Australia; moved the Dutch out; moved the French out; and drove China, which was then a relatively strong nation and an ally of ours, clear back into the mountains.

Now, what do we have? We already have international communism, that has taken, not 75,000,000 people, but more than 400,000,000 people of China, behind the iron curtain. Most of the responsible government officials of that area of the world, representing the Governments in Korea, the Philippines, and other places, recognize that the problem of holding southeast Asia, Burma, Indochina, and Siam is rendered very much more difficult by letting the Chinese Communists reach the borders of those countries, because there is the opportunity for a Greek situation, multiplied 10 times. In other words, with large Chinese populations in those countries, the opportunity of running arms, of having an incursion of agitators, of stirring up revolt, is greatly increased, and there are some people who believe, and I think with good reason, that if we lose all of China, with her 450,000,000 people, and southeast Asia, with some 100,000,000 more, the problem of ultimately holding India and Pakistan will be greatly complicated. So certainly at some point along the line we are going to have to adopt a policy.

Mr. MAGNUSON. If I may say so to the Senator, I do not agree with that at all. I think it is one of the most regrettable things in history that this has happened, but I do say that in any discussion of this matter we must discuss the alternative. The Senator has recommended some alternatives, with which I may or may not agree. But I think that in any discussion of this matter we must consider the alternative.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Obviously.

Mr. MAGNUSON. It happens that in China there is a peg on which we are hanging our hat—an alternative that also must be investigated. That is what is bothering me about the matter.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Of course we had that same problem in Greece.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Yes; we did.

Mr. KNOWLAND. We entered the situation when there was a civil war in Greece, and we supported the legal government against the Communists, because we felt the Communist international conspiracy was trying to take away the liberties of the people of Greece. We may not have agreed 100 percent with the Greek Government, as then constituted——

Mr. MAGNUSON. I do not think we did, at the time.

Mr. KNOWLAND. But we felt it was important to the peace of the world and to the security of this Nation not to permit Greece to become communistic.

We took a considerable calculated risk in Berlin. Very recently we were flying our planes over territory controlled by the greatest—and I say it advisedly—the greatest land military power in the world today, the Soviet Union. At any time some of those planes might have been shot down. Had they been, we would have faced a very difficult alternative. But, had we backed down, all Berlin would today be Communist, probably all of western Germany, and perhaps all of western Europe.

So we stood up to communism in Europe, and communism itself has receded. In every nation where a free election has been held the Communist strength has diminished since we undertook to stand up to communism in that area of the world. But in Asia, what did we do? There we cringed before communism. We permitted our Ambassador to be held in his compound. We permitted an American vice consul to be beaten up by the Communist police. We permitted Mr. Angus Ward to be held in confinement for 13 months and thrown into a common jail. A young man from Long Beach, Calif., wearing the uniform of the American Navy, and a sergeant of the United States Marine Corps have been held prisoners of the Communists for 13 months, and we have done nothing about it but send them notes, to slap them on the wrist, and to ask them will they not please let them out. A man wearing the uniform of a general of the United States, General Soule, and his assistant for 4 months had been trying to get out of the country, and every obstacle was thrown in their path. So I say advisedly we cringed before communism there.

When I was in the Far East last, in January 1946, this Nation stood at the peak of its power and prestige in that area of the world, and it almost brings tears to one's eyes, I say to the Senator from Washington, when he sees the low estate into which we have fallen today by the bankrupt policy we have followed in the Far East.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I do not disagree with the statement of the cases the Senator makes. We are all trying to seek an intelligent answer, and my only point was that in these discussions there should be some mention of the alternative. If we do what the Senator says, perhaps that is the wise thing to do; but in arriving at that policy we must consider the alternative.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes.

Mr. MAGNUSON. There has been no discussion on this floor and, I think, too little in the press of the alternative. That is all I suggest. I do not disagree with the Senator.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Will the Senator not admit, however, that this is a pretty late date for us to send Dr. Jessup on a slow boat to China, and for us to announce that we are waiting until February 1, to send our Joint Chiefs to talk with our Supreme Commander in the Pacific about what should be done in Formosa, when as a matter of fact today, prior to any of the discussions, the President of the United States writes off any further military assistance to the Republic of China, which was our wartime ally and friend. Whom are they trying to kid? What kind of consultations were they going to have? Was it merely to take the heat off in Congress? Was this merely window dressing they were going through, or do they sincerely mean to try to find a new policy? I say, based on the record, which cannot be disputed, including the memorandum of December 23, and the President's statement today at his press conference, they had no intention of helping the Republic of China to resist the Communist invasion there.

The responsibility is solely and exclusively on the shoulders of the administration. The Republican Party has not been consulted; it has not been called into any bipartisan consultation on foreign policy. This debacle solely and exclusively rests upon the administration which initiated and tolerated it.

Mr. MAGNUSON. The Senator has said that Dr. Jessup has been sent out there. That is correct. We have sent all sorts of persons to China, while the war was still in progress and even prior to the war. They have all come back with different answers and conclusions. There have been three or four missions which I recall. I do not know the objective of Dr. Jessup's visit. But surely the information we have received has been well examined by those who have gone there long prior to this time. Again I say that there is much confusion, and it may be that the Senator's conclusions are correct; but, nevertheless, the alternative has never been discussed.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Let me call the Senator's attention to a dispatch from the Associated Press which appears in tonight's Washington Star:

Roving United States Ambassador Philip C. Jessup arrived today in Japan, first stop on an Asian survey trip that will take him to Formosa—new focal point of American controversy on far-eastern policy.

The tall, lanky envoy said he will confer with General MacArthur on the matter of the big island. Formosa is the last-stand bastion of Chiang Kai-shek's Chinese Nationalist Government.

It seems to me to be a little futile to have him out there preparing to discuss with our supreme commander the importance of Formosa while, at the same time, the President is announcing that we do not intend to do anything about Formosa.

Mr. MAGNUSON. We have had many missions to Formosa.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. The President says, in a statement issued today:

Similarly, the United States Government will not provide military aid or advice to Chinese forces on Formosa.

Does not the Senator feel that that is entirely inconsistent with the position this country took in Greece, under almost the same circumstances?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Not only in Greece, but it is also inconsistent with what we are doing in Korea, where we have a very able mission. I met with them myself last month. Under General Roberts, they are training the Korean Army, who have been subject to incursions across that territory.

Mr. TAFT. This statement of the President is absolutely contrary to every other policy pursued by the Government throughout the world today.

Mr. KNOWLAND. That is correct—where we have a will to prevent communism from going beyond the iron curtain.

Mr. TAFT. The President continues:

In the view of the United States Government, the resources on Formosa are adequate to enable them to obtain the items which they might consider necessary for the defense of the island.

Does the Senator regard that as an implication in any way that if we consider they are not sufficient, we shall then provide aid, or is it merely an excuse?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I regret to say that, based on the information I have, I think that is window dressing because I think it is clearly indicated that there is no intention of giving any support other than the $75,000,000 for military aid appropriated by the Congress at the last session.

Mr. TAFT. The last sentence of the President's statement is as follows:

The United States Government proposes to continue under existing legislative authority the present ECA program of economic assistance.

Does the Senator know of any economic assistance now being rendered to Formosa?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes; a very limited amount, primarily the joint Chinese rural rehabilitation program. We sent last month, I think, four shiploads of fertilizer. We want to increase production. But fertilizer will not stop communism. That is not, basically, what the people want who are trying to defend their island against the same type of Communist aggression which has occurred in other sections of the world.

Mr. TAFT. The President's statement says:

Nor does it—

The United States—

have any intention of utilizing its armed forces to interfere in the present situation.

Are we not bound by treaty to use our armed forces to interfere with Communist invasion of Denmark or of the islands in the Baltic, or of Norway, or any of the other parties to the North Atlantic Treaty?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I would merely say that this is the difference. This is a point which I was discussing with the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON]. In the case of an overt aggression, I think the situation is very clear. I think it is less clear in a locally inspired rebellion, though I am inclined to believe that even there we would have, in the North Atlantic community, some considerable interest in a Communist attempt to attack. But it is not quite so clear a point as would be the marching of Russian troops across a frontier.

Mr. TAFT. The Greek situation is similar.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes.

Mr. TAFT. The rejection of any idea of using our armed forces to stop the advance of communism in the area in question is wholly inconsistent with what we have agreed to do in stopping the advance of communism in Europe.

Mr. KNOWLAND. That is correct. The legal Government of China is now being attacked.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I should like to suggest to the distinguished Senator from California that we make a mistake when we say the executive department has no policy in China. I think there has been a very definite policy there. I should like to suggest that putting communism into Manchuria resulted from a definite agreement to which we were a party, and this gave communism a perfect springboard to go into the rest of China. I suggest that a second policy was the effort of the administration to persuade the nationalists of China to take Communists into their Government. The result which has occurred is therefore the desired result. The only difference is that the Communists had to fight for what they got, while our executive policy was to give it to them without a fight.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I think, based on the cold record, the Senator has substantial grounds for his statement, and I believe they are correct grounds for saying that we have accelerated the spread of communism in China by the policies followed by our Government.

Mr. MILLIKIN. It has been suggested that we have not considered the alternatives sufficiently. I think the choice of alternatives is made very clear by the fact that one of them, the maintenance of the Chinese Nationalist Government did not involve the maintenance of an enemy against the United States, whereas the other alternative comes to that very thing. I suggest that the choice of alternatives is very simple for any citizen of the United States to make.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I may say to the able Senator from Colorado that when the whole story is revealed to the people of the United States I think they will react very strongly to the policy which their Government has followed, which, while calling upon them to give aid and assistance to stop communism in Europe, has, in fact, been aiding, abetting, and giving support to the spread of communism in Asia.

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MAGNUSON in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. JENNER. The Senator has been reading much in the press about America winning the cold war. From what the Senator has just reported, I should like to ask him to state frankly to the American people whether we are winning the cold war.

Mr. KNOWLAND. As a Senator of the United States, I may say to the Senator from Indiana, and I say it reluctantly, that after having been in the Far East I am personally convinced that internationally communism has made gains in Asia which many times offset the losses of communism in Europe.

Mr. JENNER. Are not the figures something like this? In January, 1945, at the end of World War II, the Communists dominated 190,000,000 people on the world's surface. Today, less than 4 years from the end of World War II, the Communists dominate 800,000,000 people, almost half of the world's population. Is not that a correct statement?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I do not know precisely the population figures. I think they are substantially that ratio. Certainly more than that number of persons are now jeopardized by international communism.

Mr. JENNER. In other words, the Marshall plan to stop the spread of communism in Europe has been merely a holding action while communism ran rampant in the East. After communism consolidates her gains in the East what is to prevent her from coming back and picking up where she left off in the West?

Mr. KNOWLAND. When she has consolidated her position, I think she will do precisely that.

Mr. JENNER. I think the Senator has done the American people a great service in bringing out his report on this very timely subject, though I think he does the American people an injustice when he states it can all be charged to the present administration, because the Senator took the assumption that we, as a party, the Republican Party, were invited to participate in a bipartisan foreign policy on western Europe, but the Democrats did not extend us the courtesy of inviting us in on a bipartisan foreign policy on the Far East. Therefore I do not blame the present administration for this debacle of the world which we face today. I blame the Republican Party as much if not more than I blame the Democratic Party, because bipartisanism in one part of the world affecting the foreign policy cannot be separated from any other part of the world. If we are to have bipartisanism in the foreign policy, we must be bipartisan all over the world.

My suggestion to the Republicans and to America is to have a rebirth of the two-party system of government, so that when things are going on as they have been going on for 4 years in China, we as a party can stand up and do what we are obligated to do, be a party of opposition, draw the issues, and give the American people a choice.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I speak as one who has supported the American foreign policy in Europe, and I say to the Senator from Indiana that I have proudly supported the American foreign policy in Europe, because I do not believe it was in the interest of the peace of the world or the security of this Nation to have western Europe overrun by Soviet Russia. Had we not had a foreign policy that stood up to communism in Europe—while it is somewhat of an academic question, of course, and we cannot prove it—my personal judgment is that, with the possible exception of Great Britain, all of western Europe would today be under Communist domination. I do not happen to think that would be in the best interest of the peace of the world or the security of this Nation.

I believe that the Republican Party made a substantial contribution to our foreign policy. I believe it did it by correcting mistakes which had been suggested by the administration. I believe it did it by improving legislation, and in many other ways. But my point is that we have had no such policy in the Far East. The administration has followed a contrary policy in that area of the world.

Mr. JENNER. Why have we not had such a policy in the Far East? If we had a bipartisan foreign policy in Europe, why did the Republican leaders, who were exponents of a bipartisan foreign policy in Europe, stand by and not say anything about our having a say, at least, in the Far East?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I will say to the Senator from Indiana—and there is no need of the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from California differing with each other in this——

Mr. JENNER. Not at all, but I want the American people to see this picture. I want the Republicans to know what is going on.

Mr. KNOWLAND. In my opinion the Senator cannot merely with a wave of his hand eliminate the constitutional process in the United States. Basically the President of the United States has control of the foreign policy, under the Constitution.

Mr. JENNER. Wait a moment.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The President has direction of the day-by-day operation of our foreign policy.

Mr. JENNER. That is correct.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Unfortunately—and I think the Senator from Indiana will agree with me—the Democratic Party has been in control of the Presidency for, lo, these many years, so under the Constitution it has had primary responsibility for the Nation's foreign policy. The only place where the Republican Party can make itself felt, of course, in such matters is the Congress of the United States as the questions come before it. I believe that the Republican Party has made a substantial contribution to saving western Europe from communism and in improving the programs that were offered. But, unfortunately, the President of the United States, who under the Constitution has the primary responsibility for our foreign policy, came forth with no such policy in the Far East. To the contrary, under his day-by-day direction, for which he has the sole responsibility, he either permitted or induced the representatives of our country in the Far East Commission and in the State Department and in the diplomatic forces overseas to follow this contrary policy.

I do not say that the Congress has not some responsibility, because, as the able Senator from Indiana knows, for some considerable period of time I have been trying, along with other Senators on the floor of the Senate, on both sides of the aisle, to arouse some interest in the Far East. I have objected to the lowering of an iron curtain between the doings of our diplomatic representatives overseas in China and elsewhere, and the American Congress and the American people, who I believe are entitled to information. I am sure the able Senator knows that in numerous instances it has been most difficult for the Congress of the United States to get the information we wanted. Take the Wedemeyer report as an example. Had we had the Wedemeyer report when General Wedemeyer issued it, it would have given us a basis on which to go to work on some of these problems.

Mr. JENNER. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt. I understand that General MacArthur makes a biweekly report to the Joint Chiefs of Staff. He certainly knows what has been going on in the Far East, being the supreme commander in that area. Yet, I understand that the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body has never had access to those reports. I say it is deplorable that under the bipartisan system we should accuse the President of the United States for what has been going on, when the Republicans—though I have not—have closed their eyes and have said, "We will cooperate in a bipartisan foreign policy in western Europe, but if you do not want to tell us what is going on in the Far East, it is all right, and when you get ready to take us in on your program, we will come in to 'bipartisan' some more with you."

I repeat the prediction, which I first made on this floor a year ago when we were debating the North Atlantic Pact, that that is only the first pact. As the result of the very information the Senator from California has brought before us today, I say there is going to be another international grab bag in the Pacific. They all have their hands out. Senators know what this administration did recently in Indonesia, before that country became an independent government. They shoveled in several million dollars of ECA aid so that they could do it legally. As one travels around the world, as I have recently done, we find that those who have gotten millions and billions of dollars are wanting millions and billions more. Those who are not getting any say, "You gave it to others, you had better give it to us or we are going communistic, too."

We are making an international grab bag out of this country. Stalin is winning the cold war. He does not have to fire a shot or spend a ruble. All he has to do is to keep doing what he has been doing, and he will bankrupt us.

So far as Europe is concerned, the most the Marshall plan has done has been holding the line. Why? Most of those in Europe seem to be either socialistic or communistic; there is only a degree of color between them, and so far as I am personally concerned, I am color blind. One out of every four Frenchmen is a Communist, and the others of them are either Fascist or Socialist. We will not speak to Franco, yet we are playing "footsy" with Tito, who is a Communist. We sent him $20,000,000 from the Export-Import Bank, and he has his snoopers in Washington trying to get more, and he will get it.

I talked to Bevin. I said, "Are you not concerned with your situation in Hong Kong, with the spread of communism in China and their success there?" He smiled—and there are other Senators on this floor who will verify this statement—and said, "Don't you worry about Hong Kong." He already had his deal made.

Mr. President, the Senator from California has made a magnificent contribution today toward awakening the American people to what is going on. We now have to follow through by returning the two-party system of government to America before we strangle ourselves in continuing bipartisan support of foreign isms.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President——

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, before I yield to the Senator from Michigan, I merely wish to say that I happen to differ to some considerable degree on the point raised by the Senator from Indiana, for whom I hold a high personal regard. I do not believe that this Nation can return to isolationism any more than an adult can return to childhood, no matter how pleasant our childhood recollections may be.

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President——

Mr. KNOWLAND. If the Senator will permit me to finish; I did not interrupt the able Senator. In my responsibilities, in addition to being a member of the Committee on Armed Services and of the Committee on Appropriations, I have served since its inception on the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

Perhaps that association has made me realize that we do live in the age of the airplane and the atom.

As the able Senator from Indiana has done, I have flown the Pacific and the Atlantic on numerous occasions. This world is a much different world from what it was when General Washington was President and made his Farewell Address to the country. The distance over the polar ice cap is much shorter than the distances covered over former routes of travel. While I hope it will never happen, I personally believe that in the event some overt aggressor nation decides to move in the future, never again will the United States of America have 3 or 4 years to prepare itself. I think the United States of America will be the first target of any potential aggressor, because the Germany of the Kaiser and the Germany of Hitler both saw how the industrial potential and the manpower resources of this Nation turned the tide and snatched victory out of their hands.

Mr. President, no man can look into a crystal ball and discover what the future may bring forth; no man can be certain or dogmatic respecting these things; but, based on the information at my disposal, I believe that the first notice of an outbreak of another war will be when the major industrial and communication centers of America have been subjected to an atomic bomb attack to paralyze this Nation. The attack will not necessarily be on our coastal cities of Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland, or Seattle, or Boston, or New York. The interior cities are really on the coast lines of America, because the polar ice cap is the shortest distance across. So every American must form his judgment based on the facts as they exist today in this age of the airplane and the atom bomb.

The reason the Senator from California has supported the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]—and I say I have proudly supported the Senator from Michigan in trying to make a Republican contribution to world affairs—is because I think it is urgent that we maintain a free world of free men; that we try to develop a community of nations so that the law-abiding countries will always have a greater aggregation of power than the potential aggressor nations and the dictatorship states, whether they be Nazi or Communist.

I say again that I do not believe it is in the interest of the peace of the world, I do not believe it is in the interest of the security of my own country to permit 240,000,000 Europeans to go behind the iron curtain, with the great industrial complex which exists in that part of the world.

I admit that men may honestly differ with that point of view. Each of us as a Senator of the United States must search his conscience to determine how he will vote on those questions. But based on the information at my disposal I pursued the course I did. I am just as critical, however, of what I believe has been a misguided policy in Asia, because I say, regretfully, that I think it has undone in Asia most of what has been accomplished in Europe.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. THYE. I wish to comment on what the able Senator from California said respecting western Europe. I think the Senator has stated the case most clearly as to what we achieved and accomplished in western Europe. I am indeed happy to say that I fully concur with him. The mistakes we made in Asia were mistakes made only in Asia. I do not believe we have made the same kind of mistakes in western Europe. A sad state of affairs would now exist had we not stepped into western Europe and done what we did there. What we have achieved there has given us a great amount of security insofar as the aggressiveness of the ideology of communism is concerned. We can more fully understand what that security means to us when we consider what the Communists could have achieved and accomplished had they gained possession of the industrial section of the entire western Europe.

Mr. President, I am very happy to say that I fully concur with what the Senator from California has said respecting western Europe. If we made a mistake in Asia, that, in my opinion, is something entirely separate from western Europe.

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. JENNER. I agree with what the Senator from California has said. There is no need to talk about isolation. Isolation is about as extinct as the Pharaohs of Egypt.

The Senator from California said, and I agree with him, that when the next conflict comes, if it shall come, our vital centers will be the targets for the first attack. But the world being in the condition the Senator from California has described, with communism having made its greatest gains during the past 4 years, during peacetime years, what are we doing about our own defense? This year, in order to proceed with our grandiose international schemes we are cutting down, by an estimated $2,000,000,000, the amount to be spent for the defense of our own country. At the same time we are increasing the defenses of nations thousands of miles away by probably another $1,000,000,000. Then if we are to assume an additional load in the Pacific and place it on the American taxpayers we are going to play right into the hands of Joe Stalin. Communism will take over in our very home country when we become economically and militarily weak.

I agree with the Senator from California that we must keep our Nation strong in order to be able to befriend peoples all around the world.

I do not know what the answer to the Chinese situation is now. I agree with the Senator from California that there has been a betrayal of the Chinese people, our traditional allies. But I do know that one-sixteenth of the world's population, representing the United States of America, cannot continue to do for themselves, do for the Marshall plan countries, do for the Middle East, the Near East, and the Far East, what all those nations are expecting and are going to continue to expect—and I address myself particularly to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE] who just spoke—and still remain solvent both economically and militarily at home.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I want to say to the Senator from California that in my opinion it is very helpful to have this debate on the floor of the Senate because, I think, it will enable the American people to learn, through the discussion here, what some of these problems are. It is going to be very helpful, too, to some of us on the floor of the Senate who need a good deal of information about Formosa and the rest of Asia. It is in that spirit that I rise to ask the Senator from California a few questions in regard to Formosa.

First, I am not certain that I have clearly in mind the legal status of Formosa at the present time. I would appreciate it very much if the Senator from California would briefly explain to me what the legal status of Formosa is in international law today, and what rights, if any, we have in Formosa.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I have a specific statement giving the actual quotation from the various agreements that will be helpful, and if I cannot find it in the brief case I have here I will have it added to the RECORD. That will give the precise language.

My understanding of the situation is that at the Cairo Conference, attended by President Roosevelt, Prime Minister Winston Churchill, and Chiang Kai-shek, it was agreed that following the defeat of Japan, Formosa, which historically had been a part of China up to the time it was taken away from China in the Sino-Japanese War, would be returned to China. I think that is the first time we determined precisely what should be done respecting Formosa, though there may have been preliminary discussions.

Then later in the Potsdam declaration there is a paragraph which also states that Japan will be stripped of her war-gained conquests, and they will be returned to the people from whom she received them.

I have the memorandum, and I shall read it.

By the Treaty of Shimonoseki, signed April 17, 1895, by Japanese Count Ito and Li Hung-chang, Chinese Ambassador Extraordinary, China recognized the full independence of Korea and ceded to Japan the Pescadores, Formosa, and the Liaotung Peninsula, paid an indemnity to Japan, and negotiated a new commercial treaty.

Recognition took place, in effect, by the United States in the Root-Takahira agreement of November 30, 1908, and the Lansing-Ishii agreement of November 2, 1917. Both agreements proposed to maintain the status quo, and by acquiescence, therefore, recognized Japan's position in Formosa.

Published documents of World War II do not mention Formosa until the Cairo declaration.

The Cairo declaration of December 1, 1943, had this to say:

Japan shall be stripped of all the islands in the Pacific which she has seized or occupied since the beginning of the First World War in 1914, and * * * all the territories Japan has stolen from the Chinese, such as Manchuria, Formosa, and the Pescadores, shall be restored to the Republic of China.

There are a couple of items I left out, which I am sure do not change the intent or purpose of the language.

Second. Formosa was not mentioned in the official protocol of Tehran or Yalta.

Third. The Potsdam ultimatum of July 26, 1945, had this to say:

The terms of the Cairo declaration shall be carried out and Japanese sovereignty shall be limited to the islands of Honshu, Hokkaido, Kyushu, Shikoku, and such minor islands as we determine.

That is the Potsdam powers speaking.

Fourth. Statement of White House on occupation policy in Japan, September 21, 1945, which I also understand was in a directive to General MacArthur, and also, I think, by him issued in a directive as commander in chief in the far Pacific, stated:

Japan's sovereignty will be limited to the islands—

And it gives the same islands I have just mentioned—and such minor outlying islands as may be determined, in accordance with the Cairo declaration and other agreements to which the United States is or may be a party.

So far as I know, those are the only mentions made of Formosa.

Mr. MORSE. I wish to thank the Senator for the information.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I may add this statement, in replying to the Senator from Oregon: Pursuant to those declarations, the Republic of China, with our consent, became the occupying power in Formosa, pending the ultimate treaty. As I understand, from a legal point of view, the Republic of China organized Formosa, which previously had been the Japanese province of Taiwan, but then became a part of the Republic of China, with a legislature.

Mr. MORSE. I thank the Senator because I think his discussion gives us a clear picture of the problem of Formosa.

My second question is this: Does the Senator have an opinion about what is the attitude of the Formosans in regard to the three parties which it seems to me are involved in this controversy, namely, first, the Nationalist Chinese; second, the Communist Chinese; and, third, the Americans? What is the attitude of the Formosans about these groups occupying their island? Is it a case in which they would prefer to have all three stay out, and let them go ahead on some basis of self-determination of their own destiny? Or do they want the Nationalist Chinese in control? Or the Communists in control? Or the Americans in control? Or all three groups out of Formosa?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I say to the Senator, on the basis of having been there, that that is a question on which many persons honestly differ. While I was there, I made an effort to talk, not only to the Chinese who were there but also to the members of the provisional legislature, who are Taiwanese, as they call themselves, rather than Formosans, and to educators, newspapermen, and to students. In those cases I tried to go to the universities and schools where they were, in order to have as wide a contact as possible. I think this is historically true: Following the defeat of Japan and the occupation of Formosa by the Chinese, as I mentioned earlier in my remarks, the first governor who was sent there was not a competent official; at least, the economy of the country did not improve. Of course, one of the difficulties in both Formosa and Korea was that during the period of Japanese occupation of both those countries, the Japanese did not permit any Korean or any Formosan to hold a position of responsibility, either in government or in business. I am told that the Japanese did not even allow the Koreans to be railroad engineers, although they would allow some of the Koreans to shovel coal, as firemen on the trains. As a result, when the Japanese departed from both Formosa and Korea, they took out of those countries all of the managerial echelon, from both government and business.

At any rate, the first governor did not get the economy back into good condition; and there was dissatisfaction, and insurrection took place, and there was some bloodshed. The Government of China removed the then governor; and since that time, as most of the Formosans with whom I talked told me, I believe they have made an effort to remedy the difficult and bad situations which previously had existed. The more recent governor, who was governor when I was there—and who since has been succeeded by K. C. Wu, a civilian, so that today they have gotten back to a civilian governor—was Gen. Chen Cheng. He made, I believe, a strenuous effort to improve conditions. They had a land reform—one which unfortunately had not taken place on the continent of Asia. Had it occurred on the continent of Asia early enough, it might have remedied the situation there. But that was not done. The then governor of Formosa did that. As a result, food production has greatly increased, because the farmer can now keep a much greater proportion of his crop. As a matter of fact, Formosa now has a surplus of agricultural products. Our ECA officials have told me that on the island there has been an improvement both agriculturally and from an industrial point of view.

I think it fair to say that the overwhelming number of the people of Formosa do not look with favor upon the Communists. I think it might also be fair to say that, as the Senator from Oregon and I might find in our respective States of Oregon and California—and it would apply to many other States of the Union—with the influx of additional people, there has been some overcrowding, some lack of housing, and some competition for jobs. To that extent, perhaps, I think some Taiwanese might look back to the good old days when they were not so overcrowded. But to me, that is not bordering on insurrection.

However, as I stated to the Senate earlier—and I think the Senator from Oregon heard me say it—I made an effort to get around, both at night and during the daytime; and there was no indication of the police-state methods such as I saw in Poland before Mikolajczyk had to flee for his life, when there were police armed with carbines, and in armored cars, going around.

So I believe there was not such a state of insurrection, and that information to that effect has been misleading.

Mr. MORSE. Does the Senator from California believe that the reports to the effect that the majority of the Formosans are just as much opposed to the Nationalist Chinese as they are to the Communist Chinese are correct? Is that an accurate statement?

Mr. KNOWLAND. No; I do not think that is an accurate statement. I think they want, and are entitled to, a larger voice in their own affairs. Having been a member of the California Legislature some 14 or 16 years ago, I made a point to visit the provisional legislature leaders there, and I talked with them. They were critical, in many cases, of some of the policies which had been followed in the past by the Government of China; but I found no indication that they want to be freed by the Communists. To the contrary, what they wanted was for the National Government to give them as much local autonomy as possible and to give them as great a voice as possible in the handling of their affairs, and to cooperate with them in the day-to-day control of the activities on the island.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator from California has been very courteous to me in permitting me to ask questions. I should like to ask this further question: Does the Senator believe the Formosans would welcome American intervention in Formosa, backing up the Chinese National Government?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I am glad the Senator has asked that question. I would say that I have not felt that the proper procedure for our Government is to intervene in the sense of sending troops to the island. There are the islands of Formosa and of Hainan, but taking Formosa alone for the moment, which is the last bastion of the Republic of China, which is fighting with its back to the wall—to be perfectly frank, as all of us know—against the Communist wave which has swept over the mainland. For us to go in ourselves without invitation to the island and establish some kind of temporary control, to my mind, would be precisely what the Soviet Union did to Poland when the Poles were fighting with their backs to the wall against Germany; and then, as all of us remember, the Russians moved in from the rear and completely eliminated the government and the freedom of Poland. I do not believe that is a course which we should pursue. I do not believe that the people of Formosa or the remaining people of free China would want that.

The second thing I think we should keep in mind is that we do not need Formosa either as an air base or as a naval base, because we have others in that area of the world.

But the thing which is vitally important to us is that Formosa not get into unfriendly hands. As for the people of Taiwan, I never saw a more friendly people than the people of that island, both the Chinese and the native Taiwanese. They are friendly to this country. We know they are our friends. So long as they control the island, there is no danger that a potential aggressor enemy will get bases there. So the primary thing, in my opinion, and, I think, in the opinion of many of our responsible persons in that part of the world, is to prevent Formosa from getting into unfriendly hands.

Question may arise, Is the Communist regime in China friendly to the United States? People may honestly differ on that point. Personally, I think that they have displayed their attitude on sufficient occasions so that, so far as I am concerned, I do not want to take the calculated risk of having in Formosa Chinese Communists who may be unfriendly to us. So I can answer the question best by saying that, in my opinion—and let me say at this point that there is a high morale among the troops on that island, and they have some good leadership—what they primarily want is some type of supervised assistance, not by combat troops, but the same supervised assistance that we have given in Greece and Korea.

Mr. MORSE. One more question, please: Assuming that our policy would not be one of intervention by way of sending our own troops over there, but would be one of assistance to the National Chinese Government by way of providing American military advisers and war matériel, might not that type of intervention lead to war? Assuming my hypothesis, in an armed struggle between the Communists and the Nationalist Chinese in Formosa, does the Senator from California feel that even that type of a contest, backed up with American war matériel and military advisers, has in it any inherent danger of an open conflict between the Chinese Communists and the United States with Russia eventually backing the Chinese Communists?

Mr. KNOWLAND. That is one of the questions which we must face. I may say to the Senator that I think the risk of a conflict is far less than the risk involved in doing nothing and waiting until we are pushed from place to place, out into the Pacific. That is No. 1.

Secondly, I think that the risk is much less than it was in Greece or at the time of the Berlin airlift. Certainly I think the Senator from Oregon will agree with me that we ran risks in both those instances.

Mr. MORSE. We ran risks with the Russians in countries the populations of which were not Russian. But in Formosa we are running a risk, it seems to me, with a population which is oriental, at least, if not entirely out-and-out Chinese. If I am right in my assumption—I am not sure that I am—that the Chinese Communists intend to take Formosa if they possibly can take it, are we then not running a serious danger, if our intervention takes even the form of military advisers or the supplying of war matériel, of an open conflict with the Chinese Communists over Formosa, a conflict which might be interpreted as an act of war on our part?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I say to the Senator from Oregon that I do not believe so, although certainly no prudent man would say that was not a possibility to be reckoned with. I say "no" for two reasons, at the moment: One, up to now—we do not know what the British and some of the other Atlantic Pact nations may do in the next few days—but up to now the overwhelming number of the nations of the world—and I say reluctantly that I think that will change very shortly—are recognizing the present Republic of China. There are very few nations outside the Soviet Union and her satellites who have recognized the Communist regime in China, so that what arms and assistance we are giving would be given at the request of the legal, constitutional government of the country which was our wartime ally and friend, and which is, as of today, a member of the Security Council of the United Nations. I think we would be on perfectly sound legal grounds to comply with their request, just as we have a mission in Korea at the request of the constitutional Korean government, in the southern part of the country south of the thirty-eighth parallel.

I should like to mention a second thing in order to amplify the answer. Some people have said to me, "Is it not true that the equipment which has been sent there has been easily lost to those fighting on the other side?" In the first place, I can say—and I have the figures to support it—that of the $125,000,000 arms program supported by the Eightieth Congress for aid to China, very little of that equipment, perhaps not more than 10 percent—and that would be a high figure—fell into the hands of the Communists. Secondly, I personally flew from Formosa Island to Kingmen Island, where there had been, on October 25, 26, and 27, a major battle between the Navy and amphibious Communist forces and the Chinese Government forces. The Kingmen battle is very important for Senators to know about, because Kingmen probably would be taken first—it would have to be taken first—before a successful assault upon Formosa, though that would not necessarily follow, but it would certainly be desirable from the Communist point of view. Under the covering of an artillery barrage from a neighboring island which they control—and Kingmen is only a mile from the mainland of China, whereas Formosa is 100 miles from the mainland of China—they landed 10,000 Communist troops. The defending forces were those that had been trained by Sun Leh Jen in this training center to which I have already referred. Despite the fact that the Communists infiltrated their lines, and on the morning of the 26th of October were firing on the Government's strong points from both front and rear, the Government forces held their positions. They so delayed the Communists that the Government was able to land another division from Formosa, and move it into position. They moved some tanks which they had had on Formosa to Kingmen. They outflanked the Communists. They inflicted 3,000 casualties upon them and captured over 6,000 Communists, with all their arms and equipment. We hear about the Government losing equipment; we seldom hear about the Communists losing it.

Mr. MORSE. That was about October 12; was it not?

Mr. KNOWLAND. It was October 25 to 27. They had enough captured equipment left over—I saw much of it myself; it was a hodgepodge of stuff, some American, some Russian, some Japanese—but they had enough left over to send back to Formosa, to equip two more Chinese divisions. The men of Kingmen fought very hard. When I got there, of course, they had been stimulated by the victory. I stopped at 10 or 15 different units across the island. As I went by jeep from one end of the island to the other, the morale was very good. They have a very able commander, General Hu Lien, who was an excellent field soldier, and as a result, that victory, plus the victory on the Chosen Islands, plus seeing personally the high morale of the men that are being trained by Sun Li Jen, leads me to believe that with some moral support, plus some of the equipment they need, they can withstand an amphibious assault over 100 miles of open water.

Mr. MORSE. I want to say to the Senator from California I think he has been exceedingly fair and frank in his colloquy, and in his last remarks he raises the final question I want to ask him. I think we might just as well recognize that in the near future several nations will recognize the government of the Communists in China. That is my opinion for whatever it is worth, and it certainly needs to be supplemented a great deal by much information that I intend to try to get into my head in the days immediately ahead. Of great concern to me is that a struggle over Formosa, if I am correct in the assumption that the Chinese Communists intend to take it, if they can take it——

Mr. KNOWLAND. Oh, I think that is a fair assumption the Senator is making, that they will try to take it.

Mr. MORSE. Granting that assumption, I fear that our intervention in Formosa might endanger a third world war. If we find ourselves engaged in any form of intervention in Formosa, even by supplying military advisers and war matériel, may we be misjudged by other nations? If, as the Senator from California says, he fears the Chinese Communists will try to take Formosa—and I fear it too—with India, which has already recognized the Communist government; with Great Britain, in my opinion, soon to recognize her; with other countries to follow suit, are we not likely to find ourselves in the months immediately ahead in a position where we will be supporting, through military advisers and war materials, a dying National Chinese Government? Will we not be supporting a government that is not recognized by a great many of the other powers of the world to our own international embarrassment? Will we not soon find ourselves out of caste so to speak in the fraternity of the nations by supporting a government that no longer represents the Chinese people? Will that not likely lead to war?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I would say to the Senator from Oregon that the observations he has made are certainly pertinent to the discussion of our foreign policy. It is the view, however, of the Senator from California that sooner or later some decisions must be made by this Nation in the Far East. I admit that any position that may be taken entails some risk, but I repeat, while it is not necessarily a parallel case, I certainly think we took some substantial risks at Berlin; I think we took some substantial risks in Greece; I think we have taken some substantial risks in the North Atlantic Pact and in the arms-implementation program, and if somebody wanted to make something of it, I think they could find the modus vivendi for stirring up trouble, if they were determined to do it. But I think we have to look over the long period of history. Here we are, a relatively small nation, 140,000,000 people, and I think it is fair to say, as was pointed out in the colloquy with the Senator from Indiana, that if there is in the future another conflict or a potential aggressor nation gets on the loose, we will be target No. 1. Therefore I think we have to take a look across the years and determine whether the very defenses of this country will be improved or made weaker by all of Asia going behind the iron curtain.

An argument can be made that we should not make the stand at Formosa, even though there is a movement of communism into the Pacific Ocean, but perhaps we should make it some place else. To me it would be far more difficult to make it at Hong Kong than it would be at Formosa, because I think that is a fairly easy city be taken from within, not necessarily by aggression from without. I think it would be far more difficult to draw the line in French Indo-China, or in Burma, because there there is a land border with a stream that one can wade across, so the same argument could be made there with far greater force.

The next question is, Supposing not only all of China but Burma and Indochina and Siam are lost to communism—and all of that is possible now, in view of what has happened, and we must face realities—then we have communism up against the borders of India. I did not go to India on my recent trip, but I went there in 1946. India has many internal problems of her own. She has a very able leader in Mr. Nehru, a man for whom I have the highest respect and regard. I have been informed that in the past on one or two occasions attempts have been made to assassinate him. The third attempt or the fourth might succeed. If Nehru's leadership were removed, with the internal problems of India, there is some doubt whether India and Pakistan might ultimately remain outside the Communist orbit. Are we to draw the line there, or should we draw it when the Communists move out into the Pacific, into the Philippines, or into the Dutch Indies, now Indonesia? Somewhere along the line we are going to have to make some decisions, and I do not think by postponing the decisions, hoping the evil day will never come, as, of course, all of us do, we are solving any problems, nor are we doing so by brushing the question under the carpet and failing to face the realities. The Senator comes from a Pacific coast State, as I come from a Pacific coast State, and, as I pointed out before, when it is considered what Japan, a nation of some 75,000,000 people, was able to do in driving us clear back on our Pacific coast defenses, I do not think the Senator from Oregon would contemplate with much pleasure 1,000,000,000 people of Asia tied into the Soviet orbit, when the men in the Kremlin have time after time said that in their judgment the free world and their world cannot exist side by side.

Mr. MORSE. I say to the Senator from California that it is because I contemplate with great fear the spread of communism, that I am so disturbed about this development in Asia.

Mr. KNOWLAND. One further point I may make at this time, after which I shall not interrupt the Senator again. As of today, January 5, 1950, we know there has been a change in the world situation with respect to atomic energy. No one knows how far the Russian development has taken them, but that they have made progress has been announced by the President of the United States himself. Let us assume the best side of the picture, and say that the announcement of the President related to a Russian equivalent of the Alamorgordo test explosion. At any rate the Russians know the secret. They have the wherewithal, but they have not stock-piled. Time runs in their favor in the matter of stock piling atomic weapons from now on. A year from now they will be much stronger than they are today. Two years from now they will be much stronger than they will be 1 year from now, and so on. Are we going to be less able, a year or 2 years from now, of drawing a line than we are today? I do not know the answer to that question. I do not think the Senator from Oregon knows it, but I think the American people are entitled to have a full discussion of the implications of what is taking place in the world, because I do not believe we can have a sound foreign policy unless not only the American Congress but the American people are adequately informed. After all, the responsibility is ultimately theirs. We are not doing our job adequately if we do not contribute, to the best of our ability, to inform the American public at a time when, I reluctantly say, I do not think the State Department and the administration have been as frank as they should be on a question of this kind.

Mr. MORSE. I should like to make this very brief comment. I am so greatly concerned about the spread of communism in Asia, and, may I say, incidentally, about the weakness of our west coast defenses, that, as a Senator from a west coast State I intend to make this particular problem in the months immediately ahead my major concern in the Senate. But I would point out to the Senator from California, that today, at least, if I have correct information, the Chinese civil war has been limited to Chinese territory. The Senator from California says, "Where are we going to draw the line?" Formosa is still Chinese territory. A civil war is going on in China, the implications of which I do not like, but I think there is a serious question, particularly in view of the prospects of other free governments recognizing the Communist government of China, of getting ourselves into a position of seeking to intervene in protecting a segment of Chinese soil in favor of one party to a civil war against another party. Because of the effect that would have on us in the eyes of other free governments, and particularly the other peoples of Asia, I am very fearful of what their attitude will be in regard to that type of American intervention.

In the Greek situation we moved in on the invitation of the Greek people themselves, to protect them against what was considered to be a threatened invasion by Russia. In the Berlin situation we were seeking to protect such American and German rights as we believed——

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. If I may interrupt at that point, I should like to say that we were not protecting Greece against a threatened invasion by Russia. On the contrary, there was going on in Greece a civil war of the same kind and character as that which has been going on in China. There was an armed insurrection against the legal government, which had a long history. As a matter of fact, right after the wartime period it will be remembered that in Athens there had been a Communist coup d'état, which almost succeeded in capturing the city of Athens, and all of Greece. It was at that moment that Mr. Winston Churchill, then Prime Minister of Great Britain, gave the order to the British troops to help to support the legal government of Greece against a Communist attack. Had it not been for the intervention of the British troops at that time, it is undeniable, I think, that Athens would have fallen to communism, followed, undoubtedly, by their taking Greece. This country got into it when the British announced that they could no longer support the occupation and had to withdraw. That was approximately the time of the establishment of the Greek-Turkish aid program. We sent supplies to Greece and we later sent a mission there. It was a matter of an attack on the country from within rather than an overt aggression across the borders.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator is perfectly correct. However, I think there was great fear in this country—there was great fear, I know, in the Senate, as the debates at that time will show—that there would be a Russian movement into Greece if the Russian support of the Greek Communists was permitted to gain headway. Likewise we feared, I think, back in 1946 and the beginning of 1947, a similar possibility developing in Italy.

But the point I wanted to make in concluding the colloquy I have had with the Senator—and he has been exceedingly kind to me in giving me this time—was that when we deal with the Greece incident and the Berlin incident we are dealing with a situation in which governments generally throughout the world recognized the then-existing government of Greece and recognized the supposed American and German rights created by the Potsdam agreement so far as Berlin was concerned.

I am one who is critical of our policy in China. I do not think we moved in at the proper time with sufficient help administered under proper conditions when there was a strong Chinese national Government. The Nationalist Chinese Government is now almost nonexistent. China is torn by a Chinese civil war. Let that war extend beyond Chinese territory—on this point the junior Senator from Oregon is certain as to his position—let it extend beyond Chinese territory, let the Chinese Communists seek to invade another country, then the Senator from Oregon will take the position that "the chips are down," and we should make it perfectly clear to the Communist Chinese Government that we are not going to let any other country, not a part of China, be invaded by a Chinese Communist Government. That would be my position, whether it were the Chinese Nationalist Government or the Chinese Communist Government.

I am trying to raise problems this afternoon which show, at least, my perplexity and my great fear that we are dealing with a situation which is so hot that the course of action which America takes in respect to it may determine the difference between peace and war, not in Asia alone, but in the world. I add to that conviction a statement which the Senator from California has heard me express in the Armed Services Committee, that I happen to be one who believes America cannot win a third world war. We have won our last world war. We will win great military victories, but if we do not win this peace, then I think America is due for a great decline, because the winning of a military victory in a third world war would of itself, in my judgment, with the difficult problems that would arise, prostrate America economically for decades to come.

So, as one Member of this body, I want to join with the Senator from California in his sincere desire, although we may differ on the procedures, to accomplish the objective of maintaining the peace. I want to do all I can to save our country and our people from a third world war. I think we must win the peace, for the costs of war would be too great, materially as well as spiritually. We cannot afford another war not only from an economic standpoint but from the standpoint of protecting liberty and freedom for all. If forced to fight we will fight to preserve freedom from Russian aggression, but I think we can win the peace if we keep our defenses strong and continue to urge the following of peaceful procedures of international law for the settlement of individual disputes.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I should like to say in reply to the Senator that, of course, we are all deeply interested in preserving the peace and establishing a system of international law and order, so that the peace of the world will be secure for ourselves and for our children. Unfortunately, there are sometimes lawless elements loose in communities and a police force is needed. I sometimes question very much the policy of permitting lawless elements to move in and take over a community on the theory that because it is happening in the business district it does not affect a person who lives in the residential district. I think lawlessness in a community concerns all the people. I think lawlessness anywhere in the world must be the concern of the entire world. I know the Senator from Oregon is as sincere as he always is in connection with this problem. But I do ask that when he gives consideration to this problem he also contemplate that the Chinese Communists may not proceed to move a Chinese Communist army across the borders of Burma and Indochina, but rather they will do as the Bulgarians and the Yugoslavs did before the break took place between Tito and Stalin, and move guerrillas into those countries and armies into those bordering countries, and perhaps in the not too distant future we will be discussing an international Communist-inspired revolt in Burma, Indochina, and in time ultimately in India and in Pakistan. When that happens, and if that happens, and if it is successful, as it is today in China, I submit to the able Senator from Oregon that the loss of Asia will be just as complete as if the Chinese Communists or the Soviet Union had actually moved their troops across those borders.

It is a new technique which I respectfully say I do not think the law-abiding nations, the free people of the world, have yet found a way to meet. If they move troops in an aggressive war, everybody can understand it, but the men of the Kremlin are pretty wise; they are cold; they are ruthless. They know that would immediately disturb Senators such as the able Senator from Oregon, and other people throughout the world. It is merely my personal judgment that they will move in the way I have suggested. They will attempt to take each of these countries as they have almost succeeded in taking all of China, certainly all the mainland of China. I hope that in his discussions and in his questions the Senator will also try to help devise some way by which the world can meet this new threat of Communist aggression.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I now yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Let me first commend the Senator for the clarity and the sincerity of his statement, to which I have listened with a great deal of interest.

I desire to understand the Senator correctly with respect to Formosa, which is the important immediate problem. The Senator from Washington stated that there was always an alternative, and that we must consider the alternative. As I understand the Senator from California, he makes himself very clear that, so far as Formosa is concerned, there really is no alternative, in this respect, that the foreign policy of the United States must be based on what is best for the security of the United States.

Mr. KNOWLAND. And the peace of the world.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. And that with respect to Formosa there are two reasons why Formosa should not fall into the hands of the Communists: First, from a military point of view, Formosa is necessary to make Japan, the Philippines, and Okinawa worth while; and, secondly, from the point of view of the spread of communism, there is a danger to the United States, as well as from the military point of view.

Is it a fair summation of the Senator's statements and of his answers in colloquies to say that, so far as he is concerned, Formosa should not be allowed to fall into the hands of the Communists, for the two reasons to which I have just referred?

Mr. KNOWLAND. The two reasons would be included, but the Senator from California would add one more, and it is in line with my discussion with the Senator from Oregon on the question of the new technique and what international communism is doing.

It seems to me that if we give recognition to the Chinese Communist regime, as apparently Britain is going to do in the next few days, we put our stamp of approval upon a police state, which is just as much a police state in China as it is in any of the satellite countries of eastern Europe.

It so happens that the people who have been overrun in China are not all cheering for communism. They have been overrun by force of arms. I have personally talked to people who stayed in Nanking, Shanghai, and Pekin, thinking that conditions could not be much worse economically than they had been under the National Government, with inflation, and so forth, who, after having lived under communism for 6 months or a year, as the case may be, have been desperately striving to get out from behind the Chinese Communist iron curtain. They report that there is more discontent behind the lines, that inflation in Communist China, as was indicated in the ECA report which I put into the RECORD today, is very great, that unemployment is very great, that there is great dissatisfaction among the farmers, whose crops are being taken away from them by the Communist armies, who are living off the land.

So long as the nations of the world recognize the legal government of China, which has its headquarters in Formosa, the people of China who have been overrun still have a hope left as we go through the psychological warfare, that ultimately they will be free and will not be abandoned behind the iron curtain. But once we give our stamp of approval to the Communist regime we say to them, in effect, "We now abandon you and write you off, as men who believe in the same type of freedom as the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from California believe in."

Mr. President, that is why I think the question of recognition is very important. I think we have to devise new techniques in the new era in which we live. I believe it is just as important that we hold out hope to men like Masaryk, as we did before he died; like Petkov, before he was hanged; and like others who still remain in Poland, Lithuania, Estonia, Latvia, and other countries, that we do not give our stamp of approval to police-state methods.

So far as I am concerned, it may be a drastic step, but perhaps the time has come when this Government should take the initiative and withdraw its recognition from the Communist police states which are destroying the freedom and the religious liberty of the people behind the iron curtain.

I do not think we can go on with eighteenth century methods to meet this twentieth century aggression, which is a threat to freemen everywhere. That is why I say that, in addition to the points raised by the Senator from Massachusetts, I think it is vitally important that the free people of China behind the iron curtain should know there is a legal government of the Republic of China which still exists on the island of Formosa, and that ultimately once again they may be free.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. So, from the point of view of the Senator from California, it is a calculated risk, to employ a term that is very frequently used, from our point of view, that we should give our moral support to the Nationalist Government in Formosa, and that we should give them our economic support, but does the Senator go so far as to say we should send military equipment, or possibly arms, if necessary?

Mr. KNOWLAND. By all means, I think so, in addition to giving them the economic support which is available under the ECA, title IV. I do not think they would need more than the amount already afforded, the $75,000,000 made available by the Congress, and which has never been used. I have never been in favor of giving unsupervised aid. I think that was the mistake made in Greece and in other places. In my opinion, a commission should be appointed so that the people could be trained in the use of the equipment, and I believe we can do that on sound legal grounds. But I think we must also meet the issue now before us. From what I have seen, I personally believe the Chinese will defend their own freedom on the island of Formosa and that the Communists are going to have rough going. It was difficult for the Nazis to devise means for getting across the little English Channel, and Formosa is a hundred miles from the mainland. But at the same time I think we should be giving some thought, through the United Nations or otherwise, to serving notice that we do not think it is in the interest of world peace and the security of this Nation to permit destruction to be visited upon the people of Taiwan, for whom we have some responsibility, because it has been under Japanese rule, and we ourselves put them under Chinese rule; I think it is up to us to see that they are not visited with destruction and death. Unless we are to abandon the leadership which we have assumed, in the United Nations, we should issue a declaration that there shall not be any invasion of any type or character.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator now yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FERGUSON. On the exact point the Senator has raised about the people of Formosa, who were for some 50 years under Japanese rule, does not the Senator feel that even though it involves peril, we should indicate that the Nationalist Government of China, which was a party to the war, one of our allies, was placed in temporary custody of the people of Formosa, and that we should not, prior to the consummation of a peace treaty involving the whole Far East, turn these people over to a Red Chinese Government which was not in existence and was not an ally to the American cause?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I think it would be very detrimental not only to the people of free China, but most detrimental to the strategic defense of the United States, to permit Formosa to fall into Communist hands.

Mr. FERGUSON. And is not one of the big factors in this whole Formosa case the fact that it should remain as it is until a peace treaty is signed and a determination is made, when the Senate of the United States would have something to say about the disposal not only of the island, but of the people of Formosa?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. FERGUSON. I will ask the Senator if it is not true that the announcement made by the President of the United States would indicate that we do not have a bipartisan foreign policy so far as the Pacific is concerned?

Mr. KNOWLAND. We have never had a bipartisan foreign policy in the Pacific.

Mr. FERGUSON. But the President has made a declaration that we do not have a bipartisan policy. The newspapers have announced that the Secretary of State is to appear before the Foreign Relations Committee next Tuesday, but it will then be too late for Congress to enter into the question of what our policy should be so far as Formosa is concerned.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I do not quite agree with the able Senator from Michigan on that point. I may be wrong, no one knows, but my personal observation, from meeting with various groups of people, is that there is an intuitive reaction on the part of the American public that under American policy things have not gone well in the Far East. I do not say that the American public, or a majority of it, has come to any conclusion as of today as to the policy that should be followed, but I do believe there is a growing feeling throughout the Nation that the administration's policy in the Far East has become bankrupt, that it has not been consistent with the policy we have tried to follow in Europe, and that public opinion in this country, if properly aroused, may even be able to change the viewpoint of a small group of willful men in the Far Eastern Division of the State Department who have been largely responsible for the debacle which has taken place in China.

Mr. FERGUSON. I will say to the Senator from California that I share that hope. It is true that hope springs eternal in the human breast. We should encourage the men who are on Formosa today to stand by and defend Formosa not only against internal revolution but against external aggression. Let us hope that the time may come when the Congress and the people of America will see fit to aid these people who fought on the side of the Americans in the Pacific. We should encourage them to hold on, for things may change. The policy announced today, while very encouraging to the Reds should not cause them to give up. It must be encouraging to the Chinese Reds, who have Russia on their side and, as the evidence shows, are receiving direct aid from Russia, to feel that the United States has said, "There will be no intervention so far as America is concerned." While that is true, and it is very discouraging to those who are now on Formosa trying to defend it, I am satisfied, after talking to the men in charge there, that theirs will be a stand to the death, and that they will not, even though we have forsaken them today according to the announcement from the White House, fail to stand by to defend that island until sometime when peace may come and justice may be brought to them.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I will say to the Senator from Michigan that if today a message can go to the embattled island of Formosa to make up for the tremendous discouragement which those defending it must feel as the result of the President's announcement that he is to abandon them and follow the policy laid down by the Far Eastern Division of the State Department, it is my personal conviction that the men on that island who want human freedom will continue to make use of that secret weapon which is not understood by Communists any place in the world, and that is the desire of men to be free. On numerous occasions in China on the continent, and in Formosa, I told the Chinese the story of George Washington at Valley Forge; how we in the early times of our history had men who were poorly equipped, whose feet were bare in the snow, who did not have either shelter or the proper arms, and that no doubt there were great and proud nations in Europe at that time who were willing to write off the Americans after that winter at Valley Forge. But I told them that with the determination to be free they carried on until we were able to found this Republic and become one of the great nations of the world.

I am convinced that today there are men in China and on the island of Formosa, who love human freedom no less than we love human freedom, and whose battle to keep outside of the Communist orbit is entitled to the help and respect of freemen everywhere, and although they may have been sold down the river into slavery by the President of the United States and the State Department, I believe there is still a tremendous reservoir of good will for the free people of China among the American people, who are not going to sit complacently by without at least giving the Chinese their moral support in the great battle they now face to keep outside the iron curtain.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is it not true also that in a republic such as ours public opinion should have something to do with the framing of our foreign policy, as to what it is and should be, and that, therefore, if we in America will raise our voices, if the public will express its opinion, we will encourage those who are standing with their backs to the wall on little Formosa, who have a desire for freedom and liberty, and that our moral support will encourage them to stand as Washington and his men stood at Valley Forge? Numbers do not always resolve a struggle. The determination to do or die for the cause may bring victory. Does not the Senator believe public opinion in America can make itself felt in such a way as to bring encouragement to those defending Formosa?

Mr. KNOWLAND. There have been other dark days so far as human freedom is concerned. Dunkerque was one of them. There have been many others in the history of the world. We did not abandon our friends in Great Britain because the going looked tough. We did not abandon the free people of Europe because the Dutch had been overrun in 5 days, the Belgians had been overrun in 7 days and had lost all their equipment, the mighty French Army had completely surrendered with all their equipment in a matter of a few weeks. We did not lose our interest in human freedom at that time.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to commend the able Senator from California for the position he has followed in the Senate of the United States respecting the foreign policy affecting the western democracies of Europe.

I have listened to most of the able address delivered by the Senator today. I agree with some of the things he has said, and disagree with other things he has said.

One of the themes running through the debate is the statement that we cannot permit Formosa to fall into the hands of the Chinese Communists. I certainly hope that Formosa will not fall into the hands of the Chinese Communists. But in view of the trip the Senator from California took to the Orient last year, and in view of the fact that he must have talked to military leaders and prominent governmental officials over there, I wish to ask him, What is the minimum amount of military strength we would have to furnish in order to keep the Communists out of Formosa? That is what I should like to know.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that that is a pertinent question and is entitled to an answer. It is the belief of the Senator from California that the needs of the Chinese National Government, in order to prevent a successful Communist assault certainly during the year of 1950, could be met within the limits of the existing legislation on the statute books. If, in addition to that aid, the people there knew that they had some moral support from this great Republic across the seas, that we feel now, as we have historically felt, that we have very close and friendly ties with the Chinese people, they would be encouraged.

Responsible soldiers in the Army of China told me that the greatest blow to the morale of the Nationalist Army of China was the issuance of the American white paper. They said it did more to undermine morale, and destroy the confidence of the people in their Government at a time when they were with their backs to the wall, than anything else that had happened. So if they receive some moral encouragement, plus the funds which are already available under existing statutes, I believe that during the year 1950 at least Formosa could be defended by the Chinese themselves.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the Senator further yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I know the Senator is quite tired, but I should like to ask one or two more questions, if I may. Can the Senator tell me, from the information he obtained on the island of Formosa, how many troops they have there at the present time, and what the nature of the military equipment is, and so forth?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I could tell the Senator, but I have no intention here in the public session of the Senate, which is open to the representatives of Tass and the Russian Government, who would pass it on to the Chinese Communists to reveal what the defense potentials are on the island of Formosa. I am sure the Senator will excuse me.

Mr. LUCAS. No, I would not want the Senator to do that. But the Senator has told a number of things here this afternoon which I thought might just as well have been said next Tuesday before the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. KNOWLAND. No. The Senator has served in the Army. I think I know the problems of security. I think I know the line between reasonable security and an attempt merely to lower an iron curtain, so as to keep the Congress of the United States, the representatives of the American people, from having information to which it is entitled.

But when it comes to giving out statements as to the number of troops, the weapons they have, or the weapons they need, I think that is a security matter which I would not undertake on my own responsibility to discuss in an open meeting.

Mr. LUCAS. I wholly agree with the Senator.

One more question, if I may ask it of the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEHMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield further to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. As I understand the distinguished Senator from California, he is not in favor of sending any substantial military force into the island of Formosa to defend it.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The Senator from California has never advocated sending any force into the island of Formosa to defend it. I have been advocating that the legal Government of China be given the aid which will permit them to defend that island.

Mr. LUCAS. In view of that answer, let me say that in the letter which the Honorable Herbert Hoover, the distinguished former President of the United States, wrote to the Senator from California—Mr. Hoover says:

> It is my strong belief that we should not recognize the Communist Government of China; that we must continue to recognize and support the National Government; that we should, if necessary, give naval protection to the possessions of Formosa, the Pescadores, and possibly Hainan Islands.

What does the Senator understand the former President of the United States, Mr. Hoover, means by the words "giving naval protection"—to the three islands described in the letter, which the Communists of China are threatening to conquer?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I would say to the Senator from Illinois—and of course the former able President of the United States can speak for himself as to what he means—that I think his letter is clear. Apparently he may have in mind that in a matter which affects the strategic defense and future security of the American people, it is not the part of wisdom to permit the strategic defense of this Nation to be jeopardized; and I rather imagine that Mr. Hoover would feel—although I am not authorized, of course, to speak for him—as some of the rest of us might feel, that in a matter dealing with the strategic defense of this country, the viewpoint of General MacArthur, the supreme commander in the Far East, and of Admiral Radford and of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and of others, should be followed when it comes to the question of the strategic defense of this country, rather than to follow an anonymous committee in the State Department who may have very little knowledge of the strategic needs affecting the defense of the United States.

Mr. LUCAS. That hardly answers the question, but I am not going to get into a discussion with the able Senator from California about what General MacArthur thinks should be done in the Pacific, because I do not know. Perhaps the Senator from California does know what General MacArthur thinks about Formosa.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Would not the Senator from Illinois think that it would be wise for the State Department to find out what he thinks? Would not the Senator from Illinois think it would be wise for for the State Department to find out what Admiral Radford, the CWCPAC—the commander in chief in the Pacific—thinks about Formosa? Would not the Senator from Illinois think it would be wise for the State Department to base its decision upon what the Joint Chiefs of Staff may think, rather than to send to all our embassy employees and State Department employees the flat-footed statement that Formosa has no strategic value?

I say, on my responsibility as a Senator of the United States, that that is a misleading statement and it is purely the statement of men who are not charged with the strategic defense of the United States of America; and I say it is a rather sad day in the history of our country when people can send out a message such as that, and completely ignore those who are charged with the responsibility of the strategic defense of the United States.

Mr. LUCAS. I am not sure that I can answer the Senator's statement, because the Senator from California may know more about what General MacArthur has said and what Admiral Radford has said and what the Joint Chiefs of Staff have said than I do; he may know more about that than the State Department does or the President of the United States does.

But I will say, on my own responsibility, that any decision the President of the United States has made has been made after consultation with the Joint Chiefs of Staff. It may be different from what Admiral Radford or General MacArthur thinks about what should be done in the Pacific, but the decision made was based upon consultation with the best military men in the Government.

Mr. President, I rose primarily to find out whether the Senator from California agrees with former President Hoover that a naval force should be sent to those islands in the Pacific, and also whether the Senator agrees with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], who has made a similar statement. These suggestions by such prominent Americans have caused much consternation throughout the country. I was very happy to find the Senator from California speaking of sending only a token force, or perhaps some sort of a mission over there to help the Chinese, if we send anybody at all. The Senator says he does not want to send a military force, and that he certainly does not want to send the Navy over there.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I ask the Senator from Illinois to wait a moment, please. If he will permit me to interrupt, let me say that, to the contrary, I think the Navy of the United States in the Pacific has been degutted. I think one of the reasons why we are at such a low point in prestige in the Pacific is because of the fact that we have permitted our Navy to get down to such a small force.

Mr. LUCAS. That has nothing at all to do with the point I am discussing. The question of whether our Navy has been degutted has nothing to do with my question.

Mr. KNOWLAND. It certainly has.

Mr. LUCAS. The sole question is whether the Senator from California believes the President of the United States should send a force to protect the island—a force which Mr. Hoover in his letter says should be sent. It is not a question of whether the Senator thinks the Navy has been degutted.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I will answer the question, if the Senator will permit me to do so: I think the Senate should know, and the entire Congress should know, whether it is the judgment of the supreme commander in the Far East, and the judgment of our other officials charged with the national defense, that the loss of Formosa into unfriendly hands would jeopardize the security of this country.

I am in favor of our having the Navy out there and serving notice that we will not permit carnage and destruction on the island of Formosa, and will not permit the island to be occupied by an unfriendly power. I have said that I think we should proceed to do that through the United Nations, because I think the United Nations has a responsibility in not permitting the spread of carnage to the island of Formosa, when that island's final, legal disposition depends upon the Japanese peace treaty. But certainly if it adversely affects the strategic defense of the United States, I am not in favor of letting the strategic defense of the United States be adversely affected.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I claim the floor for just a moment in my own time.

I wish to reiterate what I said a moment ago about my distinguished friend, the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], with respect to his adherence to the foreign policy of this country, so far as concerns the many, many battles we have had on the floor of the Senate in connection with aid to the democracies of western Europe; and I do not for a moment question the sincerity of the Senator from California with respect to the position he now takes regarding Formosa.

But, Mr. President, I wish to say that in my opinion the letter which was written by a former President of the United States, the Honorable Herbert Hoover, advocating that we send our Navy to protect Formosa, the Pescadores, and the Hainan Islands, the letter which the able Senator from California made a part of the RECORD, has stirred up a tremendous amount of consternation in this Nation in regard to what should be done in respect to those islands. The able senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], supports the same thing which the former President of the United States advocates. People are alarmed as a result of statements by such responsible persons that we ought to send our Navy to protect those islands. These spokesmen do not want to send a small military mission to these islands to help the remaining Chinese who are now on Formosa, in the civil war that is going on over there; they desire to send substantial aid.

Mr. President, any time we send any part of the United States Fleet to any of those islands, to protect them, we can prepare to send more auxiliary military and naval equipment. It is agreed here by the Senator from California, by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], and by other Senators that the Communists are bound and determined to take over Formosa. If that is their plan, Mr. President, I undertake to say that this country by even intimating that it is going to send its fleet there to protect those islands would be following a most dangerous course. If we send the Navy over there, we must send more. If we are going to follow the course the former President of the United States suggests, we must augment that force with at least 10 crack divisions to be garrisoned on the island of Formosa. If we are going to send the Navy over there, we had better get ready to send hundreds of airplanes also and all the equipment that is necessary to take care of them. That is exactly what we must do if we are going to protect and defend the island, as suggested by the former President of the United States and by the senior Senator from Ohio.

I undertake to say that if we pursue such a dangerous policy we must admit that we will become a participant in the civil war now raging in China. Mr. President, if we intervene with military force in the present civil war in China, we should prepare for world war III.

Mr. President, I am more interested in undertaking to work out these matters through the United Nations, for if there is another war both the victor and the vanquished will go down to defeat.

We have had a foreign policy in the Pacific, notwithstanding the position to the contrary taken by some Senators. We have had a foreign policy in Japan. We have had it in Indonesia. We have had it in Korea. We have had it all through the East. It has not worked out in China as we should have liked, of course; but we have had a foreign policy, and those who say we have not, those who say it is bankrupt, do not realize the progress which has been made in the East as the result of our foreign policy. It is apparent in the Philippines, in Japan, in Korea, in Indonesia, and in other spots in that section of the world.

I did not expect to speak upon this subject, Mr. President, but when the saying is repeated, "Formosa must not fall into the hands of an unfriendly foe," something more than talking about it must be done, if we want to keep it from falling into the hands of the Communists. I do not know what the military strength of the island is. Perhaps the Senator from California knows. Perhaps the committee can find out. Perhaps they can find out when they go into session next Tuesday, when the Secretary of State appears before the committee. The Foreign Relations Committee ought to find out, of course, and it will. But someone knows that the military strength of Formosa is not very great; someone has been told that is so; otherwise men like former President Hoover and the Senator from Ohio would not be advocating sending the Navy, or part of the Navy, to protect it from communism. Any time the Navy goes to Formosa, Mr. President, you can be certain that if the Communists start across some ships are going down. The chances are they will go down because of some Russian submarine that will be there, because the Communists are all together, as everyone knows. That is what I fear, Mr. President. If that should happen, we would be involved, and that could mean war—and no one is going to win the next war. I think the President of the United States followed the right course in the action he took today, in expressing the position he did in the statement. I am not so sure that the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle are right in the advocacy of the policy they have been proposing. Time alone will tell.

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. JENNER. I should like to ask the Senator, since he has made the statement that the administration has a foreign policy in the Far East, if he could give me and also give the public an answer to the question of why we have not had a bipartisan foreign policy in the Far East.

Mr. LUCAS. A bipartisan policy?

Mr. JENNER. Yes—why the bipartisan foreign policy that has applied to western Europe has not been applied to the Far East.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Texas would be in a better position to answer that question than am I; but I think perhaps his Committee on Foreign Relations has been advised from time to time as to what is going on in the Far East. I am not fully advised as to what department officials the committee has called before it and the extent of the information elicited. But I want to say to my friend from Indiana that the Senator from Illinois has advocated from time to time, and still does, the maximum amount of consultation and conference between the executive branch of the Government and members of the Foreign Relations Committee, both in the Senate and in the House. That is the position I have taken from the beginning. I still take that position.

I think my friend, the great Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], has made a valuable contribution toward world peace, as a result of the position he has taken and his efforts here in promoting the bipartisan foreign policy as he has done and is doing now. He and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] have been the architects of the bipartisan foreign policy. They have worked together all these years. The results of their work have become evident in Europe. But what happened in the Chinese situation I am not in a position to say. I shall leave that to the experts on the subject.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. The able majority leader has stated that America has a foreign policy in the East. I wonder whether the Senator would place in the RECORD today or tomorrow a statement of what that policy is. The Senator from Michigan spent some time in the East, and he endeavored to obtain from those who are in charge of formulating the policy of America in the East, those who are in charge of the naval forces in the East, and so forth, that information. He was unable to find anyone who could state what the foreign policy of America was in relation to the East. That being true, I should like to have the able majority leader state to the Senate what the foreign policy of America is in the East.

Mr. LUCAS. The junior Senator from Michigan is a very valuable Member of the Senate. He understands the situation as well as I do. I suggest to the able Senator that he ask permission to go before Secretary Acheson next Tuesday and ask him that question. The Secretary of State can give him the proper answer. The Senator from Illinois could not lay out on a blueprint as to what the foreign policy is, unless he conferred with the Secretary and with State Department officials. But I know, and the Senator knows, that we have a foreign policy there. I am satisfied from the accounts I read in the newspapers as to where the Senator went on the last trip he took, that he was not trying very hard to find out exactly what our foreign policy was in the Far East, but that he was trying to find something wrong with it. The Senator did not go over there to find out anything good about the Democratic administration.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President——

Mr. LUCAS. Any question the Senator would ask me would not be favorable to the Democratic administration. I know that from my long experience with the Senator's activities.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield for a question.

Mr. FERGUSON. Will the Senator give me his aid, that I may appear before the Foreign Relations Committee, and that I may ask that question?

Mr. LUCAS. Why, certainly. I know his distinguished senior colleague from Michigan would be delighted to have the junior Senator from Michigan appear in the committee meeting and ask all the questions he wants to ask. It has been done before. Former Senator Dulles was here last year. He was a sort of roving member of the committee. There will not be any trouble about that at all, and I think the Senator ought to do it. Of course, no one will ever satisfy the Senator with respect to his questions, but at least he will have the opportunity to interrogate Secretary Acheson. He ought to do it. I know the Secretary would welcome it.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The Senator was critical of the statement of former President Hoover, as supported by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT]. I assume without any question that the Senator did not mean by his criticism that those men, or any other prominent men, or even men who are not so prominent, do not have the right to speak out and give their views with relation to the policies of the Government of the United States.

Mr. LUCAS. Oh, not at all. I may say to my dear friend from Massachusetts that the Senator from Ohio would be the last man in the world anyone would attempt to keep from speaking out. They have that right, of course, as citizens, and the Senator from Ohio has that right as a Senator. I do not say that Mr. Hoover or the Senator from Ohio wants to get this country into war. I do not say that at all, but I do definitely and unequivocally say that, once we send the Navy to Formosa to keep the Communists away, as was clearly suggested in that letter and in the statement that was made by the distinguished Senator, it is certainly placing the American people and the American Government in a dangerous position, so far as war is concerned.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for one more question?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The Senator will agree with me, I am sure, that it is for the best interests of all the Members of the United States Senate and of the American people as a whole to have men like President Hoover, the Senator from California, the Senator from Ohio, and others, who have some knowledge of the subject, and who have definite views, to express their views in order that all of us can get better information. The Senator agrees with me about that, does he not?

Mr. LUCAS. That is absolutely correct. I agree to that, that the more debate we have upon the subject, the more opportunity we shall have of giving the American people the opportunity to listen in and to hear both sides of the question, and of finding a proper solution.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. And that is not on a partisan basis, I take it.

Mr. LUCAS. Not at all, not at all.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate at this time. I shall probably address some remarks to this subject at a little later date. The hour is far advanced. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the able speech by the Senator from California, and to the running debate.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] has pointed out the statements of former President Hoover and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] advocating the sending of a naval fleet to Formosa. I have a press release before me from New Brunswick, N. J., quoting a statement by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], who was recently in the Far East. I quote from the press release:

> This country should lose no time in adopting an aggressive policy in the Far East, including the occupation of Formosa to forestall a possible Communist sweep southward out of China.
> Senator ALEXANDER SMITH, of New Jersey, a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, declared tonight in a recorded broadcast:
> "I am hoping we will find a formula for occupying Formosa," said Mr. SMITH. "I think that it would be very simple to work out a program with the Nationalist Government there and with Taiwan"—

That is, Formosa—

> "with the people themselves, whereby we would go into a joint occupation and help them to recover."

Why, of course, it would be a simple operation—much simpler than this debate here today—if we would cooperate with the forces occupying Formosa, and tell them that we are going to come over and help occupy it. Occupy it how? With an army, with a navy, with all the military might this Government possesses?

Mr. President, I was somewhat amazed at the Senator from California when, after his long address about the terrible conditions in the Far East and the threat of communism, he did not go further into the aggressive measures which he thought might be adopted in order to stop communism. Of course, we are all against communism. The Senator denounces the methods of the Communists. But because we are against communism must we send an army into all the Communist states, to conquer communism, extirpate it, and liberate the peoples from communism? What are we going to do, if we follow that sort of policy? When are we going to invade Hungary, to free it from communism? Rumania? Bulgaria? Czechoslovakia? Yugoslavia? And Russia itself? Shall we say we will not permit communism to exist anywhere on earth?

Mr. President, the Communists have taken possession of China. We should not blind ourselves to that fact. They are in de facto possession of all the land area of China excepting certain outlying islands. The great nations of the earth are about to recognize the Communists as de facto rulers of China. What good will it do us, even if we could—and we should not—to intervene in the civil war between the Communists on the one hand and the Nationalist Government of China on the other hand?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. In view of the statement made by the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee that the great nations of the earth are about to recognize the Communist government of China, may I inquire if it is the intention of the Government of the United States to recognize the Communist government of China?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is a matter which must await developments. It will not be determined at this time.

Mr. WHERRY. I do not want to get into any quarrel with the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. All right. The State Department has repeatedly informed the committee that there will be no recognition until the matter is discussed with the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me further answer the Senator's question. It is not the custom to recognize a government until it gives assurances that it will respect international law. That is applicable to all governments.

Mr. WHERRY. Will the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate now tell us what great nations of the earth are going to recognize Communist China?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not know them all. I know some of them. India has recognized Communist China. Great Britain, I think——

Mr. WHERRY. Does the Senator know that Great Britain will recognize Communist China?

Mr. CONNALLY. I feel sure that she will recognize it. She has vast business interests in China and wants to protect them. I understand that within a very short period of time she will recognize the Communist government of China.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the Senator think the United States of America should recognize a country which will be governed by Communist Russia, with all its banditry, which has infiltrated itself not only into China but into many other countries? Can it ever become so stabilized that the United States of America will recognize that kind of government?

Mr. CONNALLY. I think the Senator is getting a little far afield from the absolute question which we are supposed to be discussing here.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator made the statement that great nations of the earth were about to recognize Communist China.

Mr. CONNALLY. I did not say they all would recognize China.

Mr. WHERRY. I ask the Senator because I believe in him. I think he believes in fair play. I ask him now as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, does he think the Senate of the United States can agree to ratification by the State Department of recognition of Communist China if this administration shall decide to recognize Communist China?

Mr. CONNALLY. The State Department cannot recognize it. No one except the President of the United States can extend recognition.

Mr. WHERRY. I agree.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not sufficiently acquainted with all the facts regarding conditions in China to make a definite statement, but I do not favor recognizing China at this time. As I have said, it depends on conditions and developments. Ultimately, if they show themselves as properly administering the affairs of China, we shall probably recognize them. What good would it do not to recognize them? If other countries of the world recognize them, do business with them, and have ministers and ambassadors stationed there, how would it benefit us not to have ambassadors and ministers there also? We do not send ambassadors to foreign countries to please the people of those countries. We do not send ministers and consuls to serve the convenience or the pleasure of foreign governments. We send them to represent and serve the Government of the United States. We want to know what is going on in those countries. We have no other way of ascertaining, without establishing an elaborate spy system. We refused to recognize Russia for approximately 15 years after the First World War. What difference did it make? The rest of the nations of the world traded and did business with Russia, and so did we, but we had no formal diplomatic representation. Finally we did recognize Russia, and she was then absolutely a Communist government. If the Senator would not recognize any Communist government at all, and that were our policy, we would soon be in a very small minority, judging by the way in which communism is spreading over the world.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. How can the distinguished Senator from Texas ask the junior Senator from Nebraska to vote appropriations to stop the expansion of communism in western Europe while at the same time this administration recognizes Communist China?

Mr. CONNALLY. I have not yet asked the Senator to support any appropriations.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, the Senator has been on the floor of the Senate and, in an impassioned plea, has asked us to approve this, that, or the other thing to stop the expansion of communism in Europe. This afternoon we are informed by the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee that the great nations of the earth are about to recognize Communist China. I ask once again how the Senator can ask that we spend the taxpayers' money to stop communism in Europe. How can I be asked to approve an appropriation to stop the expansion of communism in Europe, when, at the same time the Government advocates the recognition of Communist China or any other nation where bandits infiltrate and completely subjugate the people?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Nebraska has answered the question. He has asked it and answered it, so I shall not pay any more attention to that particular question. But let me ask the Senator this: What are the nations of the earth which we have recognized? Do not rise until I have completed my question. I want a little time, myself. I have never made a plea on the floor of the Senate for appropriations to stop communism. I have made appeals for appropriations to protect free nations of the earth from armed attack from without, regardless of communism——

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. Just a moment. Be patient, please. The clock is running on. Let me say to the Senator, seriously, that this is a free country, is it not?

Mr. WHERRY. I hope so.

Mr. CONNALLY. If a man wants to be a Communist, has he not the right to be a Communist? In a free land if a citizen honestly and sincerely believes in the principles of communism but violates no law he has a right to his belief.

Mr. WHERRY. The oath of the Communist Party provides for the overthrow of the United States Government by force.

Mr. CONNALLY. If a Communist violates the law, of course he is guilty—he is responsible for his own conduct. He may not be a member of the party.

Mr. WHERRY. He is guilty of treason.

Mr. CONNALLY. Not necessarily.

Mr. WHERRY. If he advocates the overthrow of the Government of the United States, it is treason. I shall not support appropriations for anyone who believes in that.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will bet a dollar that if we should send an FBI investigator into Nebraska he would find some Communists. I do not mean armed Communists.

Mr. WHERRY. Just a moment——

Mr. CONNALLY. I have the floor, and I propose to keep it until I get ready to yield it.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator is charging that there are Communists in Nebraska. Nebraska has the finest citizenship on the face of the earth. They are honest-to-goodness Americans. They are not Communists.

Mr. CONNALLY. I did not mean that all of them are Communists.

Mr. WHERRY. Nebraska is the best State in the Union, and the Senator will find more Americans to the square inch in Nebraska than in any other State of the Union.

Mr. CONNALLY. They are getting pretty small if they can be compressed into a square inch.

Mr. WHERRY. They are doing pretty well.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, what I meant to say was that if men honestly believe in those doctrines—and there are plenty of such men in every State—they are not going around with a bomb in one hand and a six-shooter in the other. They really believe in the principle of the common ownership of property.

Mr. WHERRY. But the Senator does not sanction those beliefs.

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course I do not.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator and I agree on most questions.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I have answered the question of the Senator from Nebraska. But I want the gentlemen who are complaining so bitterly and so eloquently and so vigorously about Formosa to tell us what they want to do about it.

Mr. JENNER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. What do they propose to do? Do they want to send an army there with guns in their hands? Do they want to send the Navy, with its flags unfurled, to protect Formosa in a civil war? Both sides in this contest are Chinese. The Nationalist Government is Chinese, and the Communist forces are Chinese. It is a civil war, and we do not intervene in civil wars unless our interests are directly affected.

I now yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. JENNER. I desire to ask the distinguished Senator from Texas whether or not the President of the United States consulted with the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate in regard to this recently announced policy on the abandonment of Formosa.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say that the President did not personally, but the Secretary of State did.

Mr. JENNER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. And he is in constant touch with the President.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, did I correctly understand the Senator to say they consulted with the Foreign Relations Committee?

Mr. CONNALLY. Members of it. They consulted with me.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I am a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I never heard anything about this decision until I saw it in the newspapers.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McMAHON. I should like to ask the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations if he does not think it somewhat strange that some of the Senators who have so bitterly opposed our efforts to assist western Europe now seem to be in the forefront in behalf of some policy, which they do not define, which they do not delimit, and which they cannot explain. Has the Senator observed that?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not like to reflect on my colleagues. The Senator is entitled to his opinion on the subject.

Mr. McMAHON. I should like to say to the Senator also that the effort that has been made here today to prove that we have had no policy in the Far East does not comport with the facts.

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly it does not.

Mr. McMAHON. As the Senator well knows, we poured hundreds of millions of dollars into the Philippines.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. McMAHON. We started right after the end of the war to see that they maintained their independence, and became a free republic among the nations of the world.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

Mr. McMAHON. The Senator knows we did our job in Japan, and I think have done it very well, and that we are working on a peace treaty with Japan.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

Mr. McMAHON. The Senator from Texas knows, and the Senate knows, that we have rendered invaluable assistance to the Indonesian Republic, and for the first time in years there is now a cessation of hostilities in Indonesia.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

Mr. McMAHON. The Senator from Texas knows, and the Senate knows, that we have taken the lead in composing the differences between Pakistan and India. Last of all, the Senator of course knows well that we have poured more than $2,000,000,000 into the effort to maintain the Nationalist Government in China.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

Mr. McMAHON. Let us acknowledge the corn, as the saying goes. Do gentlemen want us to go into Formosa with a full-fledged attack? Do they want us to go to war over China, or do they not?

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator for his question. What he implies is very true. Let us consider the case of China. We are talking about China and Formosa. We poured out more than $2,000,000,000, and sent the Chinese food and raiment. We sent arms and munitions to Nationalist China, the government which is being discussed here today. We sent them all these things. If they did not use them successfully, it is not the fault of the United States.

What we did for Indonesia has been well suggested by the Senator. What about Japan? We have occupied Japan. We have fed the Japanese, we have sent them money, we have sent them resources. Yet, we have no policy! I have heard that kind of talk from across the aisle for some years, that we have no foreign policy. It is ridiculous on its face.

We poured hundreds of millions of dollars into the Philippines? And what occurred in the case of Korea? We are making appropriations for Korea. It is making great advancement and progress. Yet, we have no foreign policy!

Mr. President, when war was on, did we have a foreign policy? Did we not send troops to China? Did we not send troops to Burma? Did we not send troops to India? Did we not send troops to Japan? Did we not send them to practically all the governments in Asia that had any contact at all with the war? We sent American troops, American resources, American arms and munitions. Yet, we have no foreign policy!

Aid to China is still proceeding. Even with all the disturbance China is causing us, we are still continuing to administer money for relief purposes in China.

Mr. WHERRY. Through ECA.

Mr. CONNALLY. Through ECA; yes.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. For a short question.

Mr. WHERRY. I agree with the Senator about the ECA appropriations, but I should like to inquire whether we allocated any of the $75,000,000 Congress appropriated for aid in China. Have we spent any of that $75,000,000?

Mr. CONNALLY. I cannot tell the Senator how much has been spent, but aid is being extended.

Mr. WHERRY. That is the aid about which the Senator from California has been talking.

Mr. CONNALLY. We gave them $125,000,000.

Mr. WHERRY. One hundred and seventy-five million dollars has been spent of the ECA funds out of $275,000,000.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am speaking about another appropriation.

Mr. WHERRY. I agree with the Senator that that is being spent, but, as I understand from all the reports I can get from the State Department, not one dime or penny of the $75,000,000 that was appropriated, the bill passing the Senate without much debate, has been spent, and if I understood the remarks of the Senator from California correctly, it is my understanding that out of the authorization, the aid they need so much could be given without any further legislative action.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well.

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. For just a moment let me answer. This seems to be a squad attack. We appropriated $125,000,000 for aid to China in the way of arms, ammunition, and munitions.

I now yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, I asked the distinguished majority leader a question a while ago, and he said he thought the Senator from Texas might be in a better position to answer.

I agree with the distinguished Senator, we have a foreign policy in the Far East, and we have a bipartisan foreign policy in western Europe. Will the Senator be kind enough to explain to me why we do not have a bipartisan foreign policy in the Far East?

Mr. CONNALLY. So far as I know, there has been no concealment from members of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the Republican side about any fact in issue as to China. The Senator from Nebraska, the leader on the other side, pretends to know more about these things than many of the rest of us know.

Mr. WHERRY. I did not get my information from the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I did not get it from the State Department. I cannot find out anything from the State Department.

Mr. CONNALLY. He got it from one of his secret agents, then.

Mr. WHERRY. That is what one has to have around here to get any information.

Mr. CONNALLY. One of his secret agents, paid for by Government money.

Mr. JENNER. Then the distinguished Senator from Texas is telling me that we have the same bipartisan policy in the Far East that we have in Europe, that it is bipartisan all through?

Mr. CONNALLY. So far as I have been able to observe. The two-billion-dollar appropriation made for China was voted for on this floor. Were the Republicans so blind that they did not inquire into it, that they did not know what the $2,000,000,000 was being spent for? Was the $175,000,000 about which the Senator from Nebraska speaks—and I hope he will keep his seat until I get to a stopping point—covered up? Was it not passed on the floor of the Senate, and are not the Republicans smart enough to inquire and to know about it in years when there is no election, as well as in years when there is an election?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Does the Senator recall that there were consistent and persistent attempts made by members of the Committee on Foreign Relations to get hold of the Wedemeyer report and see what was in it?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. And that we were met with full and unconditional refusal by the State Department?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is a vivid illustration of the bipartisan nature of the policy. The Democrats did not get the Wedemeyer report any more than the Republicans got it. So there is no point to that.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Bipartisan secrecy, I take it.

Mr. CONNALLY. No. The Wedemeyer report touched a great many matters of a highly technical, military, and diplomatic nature, so that the President did not think it wise to give it publicity, and he knew that if he gave it to as many as three Republicans, it would be published all over the world.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I wish to say for the RECORD that, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, it is a great regret to me to be compelled to announce here that I was in no way consulted about the action taken by the President today. Furthermore, I had understood distinctly, in my conversations with the members of the State Department, that no action would be taken on these important questions, such as the recognition of China and the problem of Formosa, without consultation with the Committee on Foreign Relations. I want the RECORD to show that.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I wish to say also, in answer to the distinguished chairman of the committee, for whom I have the highest affection and regard, with respect to his question to me about what I would do regarding Formosa, that I expect to address the Senate early next week, reporting on my trip, and making suggestions about how the Formosa matter might be handled without the danger of war. Possibly it is too late. Possibly the barn door has been locked after the horse is gone, because I understand the question has been settled unilaterally by the President on the advice of the Department today, much to my regret.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not know where or when the President gave assurances to the Senator from New Jersey that action respecting China would be revealed to him. He told all of us in the committee, through the Secretary of State, that recognition—and we are not discussing recognition here today—that recognition of the Communist regime in China would not be made until the Foreign Relations Committee was thoroughly conversant with and was advised of the situation. That stands, and continues to stand.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. From discussion of the bipartisan approach to this matter and talking with members of the State Department, I understood distinctly that these issues would be considered in a bipartisan way, and that no action would be taken without consultation with the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate and the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House. I, as one Senator at least, had that understanding. I think it is a dangerous attack upon our bipartisan cooperation for this unilateral decision by the President to have been made. I greatly regret it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I wish to ask what we would have done respecting the foreign policy of the United States when the Senator from New Jersey was away in India, in China, and Formosa? What would be the result if no action could be taken until he and the other Senators who were away returned and were consulted?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I think the RECORD will show that I said that, from talking with members of the State Department, I understood that no action would be taken on these important questions, such as the recognition of China and the problem of Formosa without consultation with the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CONNALLY. There are many men in the State Department who have no authority to make such a statement. The Senator from New Jersey did not consult the President or the Secretary of State about the statements he handed out about what ought to happen to Formosa, did he?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I certainly did. On my return I immediately tried to get in touch with the Secretary of State, and was told that he was leaving for Paris. He asked me to submit a memorandum to him on the subject of my observations in the Far East. I did so. He acknowledged receipt of the memorandum. I immediately sent to the other members of the State Department involved in far eastern affairs a copy of my report to the Foreign Relations Committee and asked for a consultation with them. I did have lunch with Mr. Butterworth. I went to Flushing and had lunch with Messrs. Jessup and Fosdick and reported my recommendations to them. I felt I was entitled to some opportunity of discussing with the entire State Department group what should be done in deciding these important questions. I cannot feel that any of my observations or recommendations were given any serious consideration.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas if he can advise the Senate whether, in consideration of Chinese affairs, including the possibility of recognition of the present powers in control of China, the island of Formosa is regarded as a part of China?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say "Yes." It has not been confirmed by a treaty of peace with Japan, but insofar as they can make these agreements short of a treaty with Japan, the powers agreed that Formosa should go back to China, because Japan seized it 50 or 60 years ago. However, the treaty ratifying that agreement must be made.

Mr. AIKEN. Was that agreement made since the conclusion of World War II?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes. It was made during the war, at the Cairo Conference.

Mr. AIKEN. I assume the Government of China was one of the major powers that agreed to that decision.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. AIKEN. And probably would not agree to it at this time.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator mean that China would rather Japan would keep Formosa than that Japan return it to China?

Mr. AIKEN. I imagine that China would not, that is that Chiang Kai-shek's government would not desire to have Formosa regarded as a part of China.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is a speculation I am not able to answer.

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator did answer my question, that, so far as he knows, the island of Formosa is regarded as a part of China.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. The statement has been made that my distinguished colleague the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who has taken such an important part in foreign relations, had personally been consulted in relation to Formosa. My colleague issued a statement which I think should be made a part of the RECORD to show whether or not there was consultation with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. I should like to read into the RECORD the statement issued by my distinguished colleague and released to the press this afternoon.

Mr. CONNALLY. Has the Senator the permission of the senior Senator from Michigan to place the statement in the RECORD?

Mr. FERGUSON. No; but I think it ought to become a part of the RECORD.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not going to object. I merely wanted to know.

Mr. FERGUSON. The senior Senator from Michigan delivered to the press a statement. It came over the teletype service. I read a copy of the statement, as follows:

Senator VANDENBERG. I regret that the administration has found it necessary to announce conclusions regarding Formosa ahead of a realistic consultation on the subject with the appropriate committees of Congress. Like Yalta and Potsdam, and like many other unhappy chapters in China policy, congressional advice is precluded. I regret that these conclusions also precede the factual reports which have been anticipated from the Jessup mission and particularly from the Far East conference between our Chiefs of Staff and General MacArthur. It is at least useful that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee will explore the subject with Secretary Acheson next week because many critical decisions remain to be made.

Every practical discouragement to Communist conquest, short of active American military participation, should be pursued in China and throughout the Far East, which must be totally encompassed in our comprehensive view. The rights of Formosans themselves must be consulted. The permanent status of Formosa must be recognized as dependent on the ultimate Japanese peace treaty. The vital interest of the United Nations must be recognized.

The Formosan question is presently clarified but it is not settled by today's executive statements. I withhold my own discussion until the belated hearings next week.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I am very glad to have that statement from the senior Senator from Michigan. The senior Senator from Michigan is a very able man. He has rendered very distinguished service. He is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I want to say, however, that the Committee on Foreign Relations has had Mr. Acheson before it numerous times. He has never shown any disposition not to come when any member of the committee felt that we ought to invite him, and when the committee had acted favorably upon such a suggestion. He has been frank. He has been free to discuss any foreign questions. I think it is a little unfair to charge the State Department, through Mr. Acheson, with lack of willingness to reveal anything that is known about the subject.

Now some say that we ought to wait until we receive the report from Mr. Jessup.

Many persons have traveled over eastern Asia, including Japan, who have given out statements respecting what they thought ought to be done in Formosa, and what ought to be done in Korea. After a while the issuance of such statements becomes an old matter, and I assume that the Secretary of State and the President concluded that it was about time that one or the other of them should make a public statement in regard to our policy toward Formosa. One cannot blame them.

We have heard speeches on the Senate floor, not only during the present session but during the last session, about China, and particularly we have heard complaints respecting our policy toward China. Yet, the same persons who have complained the loudest about our neglect of China voted for the appropriations, liberal appropriations, which we made for assistance to China. We sent General Marshall to China. He spent a year there trying to compose the Government of China, to keep it a going concern. Yet, now some say we have not done enough for China. Senators know what happened. They know what General Marshall told us. He told us about the corruption in the Government of China, and that it was unable really in good faith to carry out measures which would utilize the funds we had so lavishly given them.

I shall at a later time make a more comprehensive speech on this subject and try to be prepared to brief anyone who wants to ask questions.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, it is certainly not my intention to enter into any extended discussion of this matter except to say I think it would be unfortunate if we were to close the debate without pointing out that we do have, in a very real sense, a bipartisan policy respecting China. As a member of the Foreign Relations Committee I have sat hour after hour and listened to exactly the same witnesses as has the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. Every suggestion that could possibly be made by the admirals, by the generals, by the ambassadors, by the special ambassadors, and by the Secretary of State, was received and examined, and out of all that testimony has come unified action by the Foreign Relations Committee. If that is not bipartisan I do not know the meaning of the term. It seems to me the Republican members of the Foreign Relations Committee have truly represented their party, have amply represented their party, and have wisely represented their party in the committee.

Mr. CONNALLY. In regard to the issuance of the statement by the President, I wish to say that I am reliably informed, beyond any question, that last night the Secretary of State tried to reach the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]; that he had gone home, and was not available; but that the Secretary of State was going to reach him and was going to discuss the very thing about which complaint has been made, namely, that the Senator was not consulted about the issuance of the statement by the President. I intervene simply to make that statement.

Mr. McMAHON. I regret very much that that mischance occurred.

But in regard to the issuance of the statement, I also point out that it was in the possession of the Foreign Relations Committee for months and months and months. I have not heard made in the executive meetings of that committee any positive, constructive suggestion which would have eventuated in a single difference in action or in thought in relation to this problem.

So I say to the Senator from Indiana that in a very real sense we do have, and have had up to this time, a bipartisan policy in regard to China. It might have been different if the Senator from Nebraska had been on the committee; in that case we might have taken a different position. But I would not say that it would have resulted in his taking a different position than that which he has taken in regard to ECA and the Atlantic Pact, or different from the action he has taken on this floor in regard to their implementation which, if I remember the record correctly, he was opposed. I suspect that his action on those matters would have been no different if he had been a member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. President, I want a bipartisan foreign policy. I truly believe, from the bottom of my heart, that the position the United States of America occupies in the world today—the most important position any nation has ever occupied in relation to the other powers of the earth in the history of all mankind—is such, today, and is fraught with such danger, that never before have we needed unity in our foreign policy as we need it today.

Mr. President, I hope that we shall not become unduly acrimonious. I hope I have not offended the Senator from Nebraska in what I have said. I hope we can go on to develop and support a policy which will indicate to the world that we here are united and are determined that freedom shall not perish from the earth.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that the memorandum which has been read into the RECORD this afternoon by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], giving the observation of the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], corroborates entirely the charges I have made in the past few days, namely, that we do not have a bipartisan foreign policy. Furthermore, it completely vindicates me in the statement I made, that, from now on, certainly no commitments ought to be made by the State Department on the theory of bipartisanship, until those commitments have been brought to the Foreign Relations Committee and then to the Senate of the United States and then to the American people, for debate and open discussion.

That was not done in regard to Yalta; that was not done in regard to Potsdam. If it had been done in those cases, we would not be in the trouble we are in today. There was no bipartisanship about those secret agreements; and the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] has said so time and time again on the floor of the Senate.

There has not been any bipartisanship on the coalition-Communist policy in the southeast of Asia for 6 years. Certainly when I voted against confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Acheson the first time, I did so because he wanted to inject a coalition Communist commission, or at least a representation of Communists in such a commission, in Japan. I did so alongside of the able former Senator Chandler, of Kentucky, who made a very forceful speech on that very proposition, on which we were in agreement at that time.

Mr. President, I opposed the ECA authorization; I thought it took the wrong approach. But I wish to tell my distinguished friend, the Senator from Connecticut, that once it was authorized, I supported the appropriations for it. I wish to say that I did not agree with the approach taken by the Atlantic Charter. I said I was in favor of the extension of the Monroe Doctrine, and that I would go along with the Atlantic Charter if that was what it was to be. But after it was authorized, when I sat on the Appropriations Committee, I attempted to justify the expenses for it, and I shall do so again.

I said then, and I now repeat, that it seems impossible to commit ourselves to a land army, to the tune of billions of dollars, to stop the expansion of communism in western Europe, when at the same time we recognize Communist China. Why are we to be expected to make those appropriations, and at the same time leave the barn door wide open to communism in China? That is my whole record on those issues, and I am proud of it.

The observations made today by the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the observations made by the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], who has been one of the most active and apt members of the Foreign Relations Committee, completely justify my position so far as a bipartisan policy is concerned.

So, Mr. President, I myself hope—and I wish to agree with the distinguished Senator from Connecticut—that when these matters come to the Senate, as they should come to it, there will be full discussion of them. Certainly there was no bipartisanship in regard to Formosa or in regard to the question of defending it. Certainly it was not my policy; I had no chance to express myself about it, and I shall not have. But I say now that if we can have open discussions and can have the Senate advised as to what the policy shall be, then we shall have a bipartisan foreign policy which I shall be glad to uphold as forcefully as will any other Member of the Senate. But I was not consulted about Formosa. I do not know about the policy regarding it. I think some very challenging questions have been asked about what our policy should be.

But I wish to say now that, whatever that policy is, it should be arrived at after open discussion, without any commitments being made by either the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee or by the committee itself, until it can be discussed on the floor of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, perhaps it is not inappropriate that a freshman Member of the Senate should make a few observations in regard to the very enlightening discussion which has occurred today on the floor of the Senate. I am very sorry it was not my privilege to hear all the remarks of the distinguished junior Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND]. I wish to say that it is not my purpose to argue or debate in any way with him the subject which has been under discussion.

However, as one who long has been interested in our international policy, particularly the problems of the Far East, as one who used to have the privilege of lecturing to a few students on international problems, particularly those in the Far East, I have been interested to note the lack of interest on the part of the United States Senate in what could be done for tomorrow. Everyone seems to be quite sure about what went wrong yesterday. I have heard almost continuous debate and argument about China; but China has been a lost cause ever since the beginning of the Eighty-first Congress, and even before that time. The Communist troops have been on the march; it was perfectly obvious what would happen in China.

Now we are considering Formosa, which consists of some 13,000 square miles. Perhaps it would be well for us to pick up the World Almanac and read what it states about what Formosa consists of and what articles it produces. From the almanac we learn that Formosa has an area of 13,800 square miles and a population of 5,212,426. We also learn that the Pescadores, the other islands which have been mentioned in connection with this debate, have an area of 50 square miles and a population of approximately 60,000.

But now the great question is whether we should send our fleet to Formosa or whether at least we should do something to save Formosa from communism.

Frankly, Mr. President, the issue, as has been stated, is one of civil war. One side happens to have Communist leadership; the other side happens to have corrupt leadership. Of course, corrupt leadership is still corrupt and still filled with corruption, whether it be communistic leadership or other leadership.

Now the question is whether we should do something in this civil war.

Since our policy in the Far East is in question, I should like to commend to the Foreign Relations Committee interrogations and inquiries in regard to what we are doing, not only for Formosa and about Formosa, but also about Korea, where the government is tottering. Let us also say a word about India. For about 9 months the junior Senator from Minnesota has been digging into the facts and testimony and figures about India. Even when the great Nehru, one of the greatest leaders of all time, a disciple of Gandhi, and a saint of India, came to the United States, not one Member of the Senate of the United States rose in the Senate to give him a greeting—not even when he, a man of peace, came to our country. We have had many speeches about the United States fleet and about war, but not one speech about Nehru.

At this time I wish to talk about food. I happen to think that we stop communism more with food than we do with fleets. I think we stop the Communists in Europe more with economic aid and food than we do by supplying guns. Our program of economic aid in western Europe has been more successful than has our program of supplying guns to Greece.

Mr. President, what has happened in Asia? In Asia there is poverty such as none of us can realize. I wish the Senator from California had talked to us about the unbelievable poverty which exists in Asia. Poverty is a fertile ground for communism. The Communists have made their way in China not only because of the strength of their arms and the mismanagement of the nationalist government, but because of the abject poverty of the people of China, poverty such as is inconceivable to the western mind.

There is the nation by the name of India. How about India? Let us compare it with Formosa. Formosa has 13,000 square miles. India has 1,581,410 square miles. Formosa has 5,000,000 people, and the Formosans do not like the Nationalist Government of China. The Nationalist Government of China treated the people of Formosa so badly that they literally hate the Government of China. How about the population of India? Three hundred and eighty-eight million, nine hundred and ninety-seven thousand, nine hundred and fifty-five is the estimate of 1940. It is now openly estimated that India's population is in excess of 400,000,000, with a government friendly to us, with a government headed by the great Prime Minister Nehru, who recently visited this country, with a government that has been able to deal with communism within its own borders by stringent efforts and drastic measures. Yet how many Senators have brought to the attention of this body the fact that the Indian Government has been wanting food from America, and has not been able to get a crumb. We talk about sending a fleet, we have the saber out, and, frankly, the people of the island cannot save Formosa, as has been pointed out so well, unless we are willing to send airplanes and an Army there, and unless we are willing to have World War III.

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Not at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota declines to yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I appeal to this body to look into the facts. Everyone is concerned because the Secretary of State did not discuss Formosa. Everyone is concerned because the President did not discuss Formosa. How many Senators on the floor of the Senate are concerned about the fact that India wants 1,000 tons of wheat from America, and has not been able to get it?

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Indiana.

Mr. JENNER. For the information of the distinguished Senator from Minnesota, I may say I visited India only a few weeks ago. I think the situation will be found about as the Senator has described it. So far as poverty is concerned, it is indescribable. There is misery and pitiable suffering. I think the population will be found as the Senator has described it. It will also be found that it is increasing at the rate of 5,000,000 a year. But the people have just gone through an internal conflict based upon a religious disagreement. The Hindus, being the prominent people, could not get along with the Moslems, or vice versa, and, therefore, since England left, the new nation of Pakistan has been created.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the Senator does not want to prolong the debate. I stand ready for a question.

Mr. JENNER. The Senator is interested in the question of food. I want to say that in Pakistan the Senate committee saw literally thousands of tons of food. The Pakistanians have been the agricultural people of that great subject nation for many hundreds of years. Nehru wanted to enter into an agreement for the purchase of grain from Pakistan. It was refused by reason of differences in Kashmir. If we send food to Nehru, we are going to destroy and starve to death 80,000,000 Pakistanians who produce the food that India should be consuming.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I appreciate the information the Senator from Indiana has furnished. I shall simply say there is no amount of agricultural production in all Asia that can feed the 400,000,000 people of India. If we should take the food that is in Pakistan and add the 500,000,000 bushels of wheat we have in surplus in the United States, there still would be hungry people in India.

Mr. JENNER. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Most of the Indian people are getting along on less than one-half the subsistence diet that the United Nations has established as necessary in Europe.

Mr. President, I shall not belabor the point. I merely want to say that five times during the past year the junior Senator from Minnesota has placed in the RECORD material on the subject of our relationships, or lack of relationships, with the Dominion of India. I ask anyone who is a student of geopolitics to get his mind off Formosa—little old Formosa—and think of the great mass of land in south Asia that is India, with the upper stretches of this land literally butting into the underbelly of the Soviet Union. On the one side, there is the Arabian Sea, on the other side, the Bay of Bengal, and on the south, the Indian Ocean. If one looks at the geopolitics, India makes out a good case. We ought to be doing something to maintain their freedom and to maintain a democratic government in that country. But we in this country do not seem to become much enthused about feeding somebody who wants to live the democratic way of life. We seem to become enthused in the United States Senate about Chiang Kai-shek, or about opposition to the Communists. We have enthusiasm now for Formosa. There are those who voted against the Atlantic Pact, which was nothing more or less than a commitment for national defense and national security, who are the very first to want to send a fleet to Formosa. Why? To stop communism.

Mr. President, I want to stop communism, and I say that if we lose the south part of Asia, if we lose the Malay Peninsula, if we lose Burma, if we lose India, we shall have lost every hope that we ever had of being able to maintain free institutions in any part of the eastern world. So I commend to the members of the Foreign Relations Committee a study, and I give them a slogan: Rather than fleets for Formosa, let us have some food for India.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. I wonder whether the Senator realizes that in the solution of the problems of India, Pakistan, Siam, Burma, Indonesia, and Indochina, the question of Formosa and the recognition of China are vital and can be the heavy last straw which will cause those countries to go Communist. I have just traveled through the countries, and I talked to the prime ministers, the foreign ministers, the finance ministers, and the various other ministers, and the people, and those are the things that can change the whole southern part of Asia.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Minnesota has not had the privilege of being in Asia. As a matter of fact, I may say very candidly I do not think a 2 months' trip would really inform anyone very much. It helps, but it takes a long time to become a good student of a particular area. It takes many years even for a man to know his own State, much less to know a State that he cannot even communicate with, because of differences in languages. But there are people who have spent a lifetime studying these areas. There are those who have read hundreds and hundreds of volumes, and people who have made it their life's work to know. I submit that an issue in the Asiatic world today that is much more prominent in the minds of the people of Asia than communism, is food. Hunger is consuming them, and hungry people do not think well. Hungry people do not have rational minds. They do not have healthy bodies.

There are other things we could do. Since there has been mention of what the other nations will do if we recognize Communist China, that issue will have to be discussed in terms of the facts. I am not prepared to make any statement as to whether or not we ought to recognize Communist China. I do not like Communists. I wish we did not have to recognize any of them. But I may say that the Communists in Europe and the Communists in Asia are making millions of converts on the basis of one thing we are doing in America. The Congress of the United States can do something about it, and it will not cost a penny. It can be made bipartisan or strictly one party. I refer to the passage of civil-rights legislation. Wherever one goes in the world, my colleagues, it so happens that the one tool and the one weapon the Communists have against us is the way we treat our own people. In India, south Asia, Africa, and everywhere else in the world, the one weapon the Communists have against us is that we talk freedom, we talk human rights, we talk equal rights, but we discriminate against our own people.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. I am sorry that Members on the Senator's side of the aisle are not present when he is arguing the civil-rights issue. The Senator from Michigan spent many hours getting a civil-rights bill, the antilynching bill, out of committee, but he has been unable to have it considered on the floor. I want to join the Senator in trying to obtain the passage of this civil-rights bill, and even the other bills which are on the calendar today. I hope the Senator will help in getting them up for consideration.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I know of the sincerity of the Senator from Michigan, and I surely want to congratulate him on his good work, but I say here is where we need a bipartisan policy. This is indeed where we need it. I listened to the broadcast of Ed Murrow over CBS on Sunday, with all his correspondents over the world, reporting on the first half of the century. Thirteen men, I believe it was, reported to the American people, with the greatest ensemble of celebrated news commentators that we have had in 50 years. What was the substance of the news commentaries? The substance was that our moral armor plate is weak. We have the fleets, but it takes something more than fleets to win this struggle for the minds of men. What is going on in Asia now is a struggle for the minds of men. Our armor plate is weak as we struggle for human freedom in Asia and generally for the freedom of the human race. It is weak in the fact that we think somehow or other we can buy peace with dollars. We need to recognize that it is not only the gift but it is the spirit of the giver that counts. We in the Congress should say to the American people we are prepared to help feed those people who today have the whiplash of the Communist standing over them. India is within 50 or 60 miles of the Soviet Union, with the Communist agents working in every village and town in an attempt to overthrow democratic government. What is the most important problem of the Government of India today? It is food.

Who has the food? We talk about ships. I say we are immoral. We are almost anti-Christian. We ought to get down on our knees and pray to God to forgive us for our sins, for here on the eastern coast of our land are Liberty ships, 10,000-ton freighters loaded with wheat which the Commodity Credit Corporation has purchased, and the wheat is rotting. The wheat is stored up, and here are people who are dying of hunger, with the Communists on top of them, with their government almost tottering. What are we doing? We are sitting around saying we cannot get along with Pakistan, or with this country or with some other country.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. THYE. Did I understand the Senator to say that the wheat is rotting?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I do not imply that all the wheat is rotting. Undoubtedly some of the wheat is rotting.

Mr. THYE. Did I understand the Senator correctly?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I withdraw the statement.

Mr. THYE. I hope the Senator will withdraw it, because I hope the administrators of the Commodity Credit Corporation are not so negligent that they are permitting wheat to rot merely by reason of the fact that the wheat has not been turned or has not been properly aired. I hope the Senator will withdraw the statement.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I shall be more than happy to withdraw the statement. However, I may say that if we needed to find some rotting wheat in storage, I think we could find it. Rotten wheat or no rotten wheat, all I want to point out to the Senate, which is so interested in our foreign policy, is that one of the important measures which can be taken, as has been developed in the last 3 or 4 months, is to let the people of India get some of the Commodity Credit Corporation wheat on a price-concession basis. They cannot pay for it. At any rate, they cannot pay the market price for it. I still say, Mr. President, rather than fleets for Formosa, how about a little food for humanity?

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, the problem of India is not so simple as the distinguished Senator from Minnesota would have us believe. After all is said and done, so far as food is concerned, I do not believe I saw as much food at any other place on my trip as I saw in India. One-third of all the cattle of the world are in India, but a religious belief of the people prohibits them from killing the cattle and eating the beef. I do not think we should go into India and tell the people to change the religious beliefs which they have held for thousands of years, long before Christianity was ever heard of. I do not think that would be our province. We can ship all the wheat we have to India, and the people will feed it to their cattle, and a little child or an old man will be starving to death within 5 feet of the cargo ship which transported the wheat. Furthermore, if we take the surplus food from this country and try to buy the hearts and minds of the people of India, to bribe them from going communistic, we shall starve 80,000,000 inhabitants of Pakistan. They, too, are in the underbelly of Russia.

With reference to democracy in India, we talked to the leaders there, and did not find one who believed in democracy. I found them all to be Socialists. So far as I am concerned, I cannot see any sense in fattening socialism when we are trying to starve communism, because both socialism and communism end in exactly the same spot. There is no such thing as communism. Marx and Lenin were Socialists, not Communists. When we think one-sixteenth of the world's population can feed, industrialize, arm, and defend, not only western Europe but the Middle East, the Near East, and the Far East, and still maintain our standard of living, we are kidding ourselves; we are deluding ourselves. We would destroy and bankrupt the Nation both economically and militarily, and then the thing of which peoples all over the world are afraid will take over on our very streets.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JENNER. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. It was very difficult to find anyone who was interested in the form of government or the economic system of America. Is it not true that we found no one who was actually trying to sell the American form of government, which consists of a political system and an economic system, a political system which protects the life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness of its people, and the property of its people through a three-dimension system, executive, judicial, and legislative? We found no one who believed in such a system, nor did we find any American, outside of members of the committee, and those who were accompanying the committee, trying to sell the American system or trying to tell the people that any aid they received from us, be it food, economic aid, or military aid, was being bought by the sweat and the brawn of the American people under a system which has operated successfully in America and which would successfully operate there, if they would try it. Is not that a fact?

Mr. JENNER. That is exactly the fact. We talk about lifting those people up. In every country we entered, countries which have been in existence for thousands of years, with a basic economy of agriculture, we found the people talking about being industrialized. They said, in effect, "You have got to furnish the money, the materials, and the machinery to industrialize us." Every nation is wanting to become self-sufficient.

Mr. FERGUSON. And nationalistic.

Mr. JENNER. That is correct.

Mr. FERGUSON. The most outstanding isolationist in America, if that is what we call them, is an evangelist compared with the nationalism we found in other countries. Is not that a correct statement?

Mr. JENNER. That is true.

RECESS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

SENATE

FRIDAY, JANUARY 6, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 4, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou God of love and hope, through all the length of changing years, Thy goodness faileth never. Lead us this day in the paths of righteousness, for Thy name's sake. In these confused times save us from any panic of spirit, because we draw our inner strength from deep wells. Enable us to fill swift hours with mighty deeds; to bear the fret of care, the sting of criticism, the drudgery of unapplauded toil; to think clearly; to act kindly; to strike our blow for the preservation of freedom and keeping to the end of our brief day the unbroken vigil of the inner light, to leave the world better for our sojourn in it. Amen.

ATTENDANCE OF A SENATOR

ELMER THOMAS, a Senator from the State of Oklahoma, appeared in his seat today.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. LUCAS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, January 5, 1950, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE

On request of Mr. LUCAS, and by unanimous consent, Mr. PEPPER was excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate until Wednesday next.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Public Works has scheduled public hearings on various flood-control and public-works projects to be held in New Mexico next week. As a member of the subcommittee which will hold the hearings, I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to be absent after today until such time as I can conclude my work on the subcommittee in connection with such hearings. I hope to return to the Senate by Thursday of next week. I ask unanimous consent to be absent until that time, or such additional time as necessary to conclude this official duty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN] are absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] are necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Members of the Senate be permitted to introduce bills and joint resolutions, submit petitions and memorials, and present routine matters for the RECORD, as though we were in the morning hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ECONOMIC REPORT OF THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 388)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Joint Committee on the Economic Report:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., January 6, 1950.

The honorable the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,

The honorable the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIRS: I am presenting herewith my Economic Report to the Congress, as required under the Employment Act of 1946.

In preparing this report, I have had the advice and assistance of the Council of Economic Advisers, members of the Cabinet, and heads of independent agencies.

Together with this report, I am transmitting a report, the Annual Economic Review: January 1950, prepared for me by the Council of Economic Advisers in accordance with section 4 (c) (2) of the Employment Act of 1946.

Respectfully,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Resolutions adopted by the York (Pa.) City Council, the Delaware State Dental Hygienists Association, Wilmington, Del., the Chambersburg (Pa.) Chamber of Commerce, and the Cleveland (Ohio) Dental Society, protesting against the enactment of legislation providing compulsory health insurance; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

A resolution adopted by the American Society for the Study of Sterility, adopted at Atlantic City, N. J., favoring the issuance of a commemorative stamp to honor James Marion Sims; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

A letter in the nature of a petition signed by Mrs. Al xander Stewart, National Legislative Secretary, Women's International League For Peace and Freedom, Washington, D. C., relating to certain legislation pending before the Congress; ordered to lie on the table.

PROHIBITION OF LIQUOR ADVERTISING—PETITIONS

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I have received two petitions, identical in verbiage, one from Mrs. Armenia T. Carver, secretary of the Rockwell City, Iowa, WCTU, and signed by a number of citizens of Rockwell City and Calhoun County, Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the transportation of alcoholic beverage advertising in interstate commerce; the other petition comes from Mrs. Ann E. Currie, president of the WCTU of Schaller, Iowa, and signed by a number of citizens of that city. Each of the petitions has been signed by approximately 40 persons, and is accompanied by the request that the petition be placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Because the verbiage of the two petitions is identical, I ask that only one of the petitions be printed in the RECORD, without the full number of signatures, but that a notation be made that two petitions are presented, with numerous signatures to each.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petitions will be received and appropriately referred, and without objection, one of the petitions will be printed in the RECORD without the signatures attached, as requested by the Senator from Iowa. The Chair hears no objection.

The petitions from Mrs. Armenia T. Carver, secretary, WCTU, and sundry other citizens of Rockwell City and Calhoun County, and Mrs. Ann E. Currie, president, WCTU, and sundry other citizens of Schaller, all in the State of Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the transportation of alcoholic beverage advertising in interstate commerce, presented by Mr. HICKENLOOPER, were referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and one of the petitions was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures attached, as follows:

To Our Senators and Representatives in Congress:

We respectfully request that you use your influence and vote for the passage of a bill to prohibit the transportation of alcoholic beverage advertising in interstate commerce and the broadcasting of alcoholic beverage advertising over the radio. The most pernicious effect of this advertising is the constant invitation and enticement to drink. The American people spent $9,640,000,000 for alcoholic beverages in 1947 as compared with $7,770,000,000 in 1945. During the same time there was a corresponding increase each year in crime, juvenile delinquency, broken homes, deaths, and injuries due to intoxicated drivers. There is every reason why this waste of money and human values should not be increased but rather greatly decreased.

PROHIBITION OF LIQUOR ADVERTISING—RESOLUTION OF WASHINGTON COUNTY POMONA GRANGE, NO. 58, PEKIN, IND.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a letter from Ralph C. Willis, chief deputy clerk, Jefferson Circuit Court, of Louisville, Ky., transmitting a resolution adopted by the officers and members of Washington County Pomona Grange, No. 58, Pekin, Ind., favoring the enactment of legislation to prohibit the transportation of alcoholic beverage advertising in interstate commerce. I ask unanimous consent that the letter and resolution be appropriately referred and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and resolution were referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF CLERK,
JEFFERSON CIRCUIT COURT,
Louisville, Ky., January 3, 1950.

Hon. WILLIAM LANGER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LANGER: I was in attendance at our Pomona Grange last night and the matter of your efforts relative to the curtailing of obnoxious advertising by press and radio was discussed at length. Our body took action and have so expressed the same by preparing a form of resolution which I am enclosing herewith.

We are interested in any plan or action whereby the harmful array of advertising and appeals may be kept from the eyes and ears of our youth.

Trusting you may succeed in getting this out on the floor for action, I am,

Yours very truly,
RALPH C. WILLIS,
Chief Deputy Clerk.

OFFICE OF WASHINGTON COUNTY
POMONA GRANGE,
Pekin, Ind.

We, the officers and members of Washington County Pomona Grange, No. 58, do hereby approve, by unanimous vote, your bill which is now in committee regarding the advertising of any alcoholic beverages, either written or verbal, crossing State lines. We trust that you will be able to get this bill out of committee and that action may be had thereon.

Yours very truly,
DELBERT A. SHORT,
Master.
LILLIAN OMSLEY,
Secretary.
ARTHUR S. LOVELL,
E. E. ANDREW,
IVIS V. CHASTAIN,
EARL DOAN,
Committee.

Signed and sealed January 2, 1950.

IMMIGRATION OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES OF PANAMA CANAL ZONE TO REPUBLIC OF LIBERIA

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a communication on the stationery of the Universal African Nationalist Movement, Inc. It is a very interesting communication and reads as follows:

We the undersigned employees of the United States Government in the Panama Canal Zone with 10, 20, and some 30 years of service and descendants of the African slaves who were brought to the Western Hemisphere during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, desire sincerely to immigrate to the Republic of Liberia. We have cause to believe that there we might develop ourselves in any field of endeavor without restraint of any kind and thereby be able to contribute to true world progress.

Because we believe that we of the Western World can offer technical assistance to the development of the natural resources of the Republic of Liberia and thereby enable this valuable ally of the United States Government to develop these resources to the benefit of world peace and trade, we therefore urge the speedy enactment of bill S. 1880, and hereunder we subscribe our names in support of said bill.

The petition is signed by 182 employees of the United States Government in the Panama Canal Zone.

In connection with Senate bill 1880, I also wish to present for the RECORD a petition signed by one individual in the Canal Zone. The petition is as follows:

Wishing the passage of bill 1880 success.
THE CANAL ZONE COLORED COMMUNITY,
R. A. AUSTIN, Secretary.
ANCON, CANAL ZONE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication and petition will be received, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

The following reports of a committee were submitted:

By Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Finance:

H. R. 2585. A bill to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 to provide for exemption from duty of certain metallic impurities in tin ores and concentrates when such impurities are not recovered; without amendment (Rept. No. 1205);

H. R. 5486. A bill to amend certain provisions of the Internal Revenue Code to permit the use of additional means, including stamp machines, for payment of tax on distilled spirits, modify loss allowances for distilled spirits, for the transfer and redistillation of spirits, and for other purposes; without amendment (Rept. No. 1206); and

H. R. 6212. A bill to amend section 5 of the Federal Firearms Act; without amendment (Rept. No. 1207).

COMPENSATION OF EMPLOYEES OF FORMER SENATOR JOHN FOSTER DULLES

Mr. IVES (for himself and Mr. LEHMAN) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 203), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to the administrative and clerical assistants appointed by former Senator John Foster Dulles for service in his office who were carried on the Senate pay roll on November 8, 1949, salary for the period November 9, 1949, through November 30, 1949, at their respective rates of salary as of November 8, 1949.

INVESTIGATION OF THE CAUSES OF HIGH PRICES OF EYEGLASSES

Mr. LANGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 204), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That a subcommittee composed of three Senators to be appointed by the chairman of the appropriate committee of the Senate is authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation to determine the causes of the high prices of eyeglasses and to ascertain whether manufacturers of eyeglasses are sharing profits with oculists and optometrists. The committee shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the results of its investigation together with such recommendations as it may deem desirable.

SEC. 2. (a) The subcommittee is authorized to sit and act at such places and times during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Eighty-first Congress, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, to procure such printing and binding, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words.

(b) The subcommittee is empowered to appoint and fix the compensation of such experts, consultants, and clerical and stenographic assistants as it deems necessary, but the compensation so fixed shall not exceed the compensation prescribed under the Classification Act of 1949, as amended, for comparable duties.

(c) The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL HOUSING ACT—AMENDMENT

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to speak for a few minutes and to submit an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MAYBANK. I am submitting a substitute amendment to title III of S. 2246, Senate Calendar 897, to amend the National Housing Act, as amended, and for other purposes. It would authorize a program to help cooperatives and other nonprofit groups build housing which moderate income groups can afford.

Yesterday I conferred with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], the ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, concerning the hearings on the amendment. He agreed that we should begin hearings on Wednesday, January 11, and continue them for about a week. I have therefore requested the chairman of the subcommittee, the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], to begin hearings on next Wednesday.

Since certain titles of the Federal housing legislation will expire in March, I am hopeful that the committee will be able to report the bill promptly after the completion of the hearings.

I should like to emphasize that the substitute amendment differs primarily from title 3 of S. 2246 in that, instead of the Government making loans directly to the cooperatives or nonprofit organizations as now provided for in title III of S. 2246, we have provided a system whereby private capital will be utilized.

The proposed legislation is in accord with the recommendation on housing made by the President in his state of the Union message last Tuesday.

I ask unanimous consent that a brief summary and a section by section analysis of the amendment, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, lie on the table, and be printed, and, without objection, the summary and analysis will be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the summary and analysis were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY ON MAYBANK AMENDMENT TO S. 2246

The Senate Banking and Currency Committee, in favorably reporting title III of the pending Sparkman bill, has already approved in principle this recommendation of the President for a program of aid to housing cooperatives as an effective means of making good housing available for families of moderate income. The legislation introduced today would perfect the pending legislation by making it possible to carry out this program through the investment of private capital, on a long-term basis and at a low rate of interest, in housing projects undertaken by cooperatives, thus eliminating the necessity for direct Federal loans. It makes the investment of private capital in this program possible by an adaptation of the type of guaranty which has been so successfully used in the mortgage-insurance system of the Federal Housing Administration.

The legislation authorizes the Housing and Home Finance Administrator to furnish technical advice and assistance in the organization of nonprofit cooperative ownership housing corporations or nonprofit corporations authorized to construct and operate housing projects, and in the planning, financing, development, construction, acquisition, and operation and management of their housing projects. The Housing and Home Finance Administrator is also authorized to make preliminary advances of funds to such housing cooperatives and nonprofit housing corporations to assist in the formulation of proposed housing projects eligible for mortgage loans under the legislation. Such preliminary advances of funds are limited to the amounts required for necessary work preliminary to construction, usually 3 percent but in no event may it exceed an amount equal to 5 percent of the estimated development cost of the proposed housing project. For such preliminary advances of funds, a revolving fund of $25,000,000 is provided.

The legislation would also establish, under the supervision of the Housing and Home Finance Administrator, a mixed-ownership corporation known as the National Mortgage Corporation for Housing Cooperatives, and would authorize this corporation to make long-term mortgage loans at low interest rates to housing cooperatives.

The initial funds of the Corporation would be supplied by Government subscription to preferred stock of the Corporation up to $100,000,000. However, this would eventually be replaced with private capital supplied through stock purchases of borrowing cooperatives, each of which would be required to subscribe to capital stock in an amount equal to 7½ percent of any loans made to them. After paid-in capital stock subscribed by borrowing cooperatives equals $50,000,000 the Corporation would retire dollar for dollar, out of such privately paid capital, the stock held by the Secretary of the Treasury at par plus accrued dividends. No such stock would be retired, however, if the net capital, reserves, and surplus of the Corporation would thereby be reduced to an amount less than $150,000,000.

The Corporation would be authorized to obtain additional private capital by issuing and selling in the private investment market its debentures which would be guaranteed by the United States. The aggregate amount of such debentures outstanding at any one time could not exceed (1) 15 times the aggregate par value of the Corporation's outstanding capital stock, reserves, and surplus, or (2) the unpaid principal of mortgage loans contracted for or held by the Corporation.

The Corporation could issue and have outstanding on and after July 1, 1950, its debentures in an aggregate amount not to exceed $300,000,000. However, with the approval of the President, such aggregate amount may be increased at any time or times on or after July 1, 1951, by additional amounts aggregating not more than $1,700,000,000.

The Corporation would be authorized to make mortgage loans at maturities of up to 50 years to housing cooperatives and nonprofit housing corporations constructing housing for families of moderate income. The interest rate on the mortgage loans from the Corporation to the cooperatives would reflect the cost of the money obtained by the Corporation, out of initial capital stock or on its debentures, plus a charge to cover administrative expenses and necessary reserves, and a charge of one-eighth of 1 percent on the declining balance of the loan as a specific reserve for possible losses. Currently, this would mean an effective interest rate of about 3 percent.

SECTION 301—PURPOSE

This section sets forth the major purpose of the title to provide a means whereby good housing can be produced and made available for families of moderate income by furnishing technical and other assistance to cooperative ownership housing corporations or other nonprofit corporations authorized to provide housing and by facilitating investment of private capital in such housing.

SECTION 302—TECHNICAL AID TO COOPERATIVES

This section would authorize and direct the Housing and Home Finance Administrator to furnish technical advice and assistance in the organization of nonprofit cooperative ownership housing corporations and other nonprofit corporations authorized to provide housing, in the development and management of housing projects by such corporations, and in the development and use of practical means for members of cooperatives to acquire cooperative ownership of their individual dwellings.

SECTION 303—PRELIMINARY ADVANCES OF FUNDS

This section would authorize the Administrator to make preliminary advances of funds to nonprofit cooperative ownership housing corporations and other nonprofit corporations authorized to provide housing, for planning and performing work preliminary to construction on proposed housing projects eligible for mortgage loans under this title. Such advances would be limited to the amounts required for necessary work preliminary to construction and in no event could exceed 5 percent of the development cost of the projects, would bear interest at the going Federal rate plus one-half of 1 percent, and would be repaid out of any subsequent loans for the projects.

SECTION 304—PROVISION OF FUNDS

Subsection (a)

This subsection would authorize the Administrator, with the approval of the President, to obtain funds for preliminary advances by issuing notes and other obligations for purchase by the Secretary of the Treasury. The outstanding amount of such obligations could not exceed at any one time $25,000,000.

Subsection (b)

This subsection would provide that the form, denominations, maturities, and terms and conditions of the notes or other obligations to be purchased by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be determined by the Administrator with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. The interest on such obligations would be at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury taking into consideration the then current average rate on obligations of the United States. Funds would be secured by the Secretary for such purchases by using, as a public-debt transaction, the proceeds from the sale of securities issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended.

Subsection (c)

This subsection would provide the methods to be used by the Administrator in handling funds made available to him under this title, and would authorize appropriations of funds for administrative expenses necessary for carrying out his functions and duties under the title.

SECTION 305—POWERS OF THE ADMINISTRATOR

This section would make the Housing and Home Finance Administrator responsible for the administration of this title and for the supervision of the National Mortgage Corporation for Housing Cooperatives created by the title. The board of directors of such Corporation would act as an advisory board to the Administrator in his performance of such responsibilities. This section would also set forth the general powers and duties of the Administrator in performing the functions which would be vested in him under the title. Among these would be the appointment of a director to exercise the Administrator's powers, functions, and duties under this title subject to his direction and supervision, such director to receive the same compensation as that established for the heads of the constituent agencies of the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

SECTION 306—CREATION AND POWERS OF NATIONAL MORTGAGE CORPORATION FOR HOUSING COOPERATIVES

Subsection (a)

This subsection would provide for the creation of the National Mortgage Corporation for Housing Cooperatives, a mixed-ownership corporation, to make and service mortgage loans, to issue its obligations, and to exercise its other powers and duties under this title, and would give the Corporation the technical powers necessary for the performance of its functions and duties.

Subsection (b)

This subsection would give the Corporation power, with the approval of the Administrator, to select its officers and employees without regard to civil service and other laws covering officers or employees of the United States although rates of compensation would be comparable to those prescribed in the Classification Act of 1949. The Corporation would not be entitled to free use of the mails. The Corporation would be authorized to determine the necessity for and character of its obligations and expenditures, subject to the provisions of this title, provisions of law relating specifically to mixed-ownership Government corporations, and to the rules and regulations of the Administrator.

SECTION 307—CAPITAL STOCK

Subsection (a)

This subsection would provide for the issuance of preferred capital stock of the Corporation for purchase by the Secretary of the Treasury in an amount not exceeding at any one time $100,000,000. Appropriation of funds for such purchases would be authorized. This stock would be entitled to cumulative dividends at a rate determined each year by the Secretary of the Treasury taking into consideration the probable term of the stock investment and the then current average rate received on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States.

Subsection (b)

This subsection requires that each nonprofit cooperative ownership housing corporation or nonprofit corporation obtaining a mortgage loan under the title subscribe to capital stock of the Corporation. To assure direct participation by such nonprofit corporations, each corporation would be required, before securing a mortgage loan, to subscribe for such stock in an amount equal to 7½ percent of the loan to be made. The method of payment for the stock so subscribed would be provided. Such stock would be required to be held by such borrower until the unpaid balance of the loan is reduced to an amount equal to the value of such stock.

Subsection (c)

This subsection would provide that after paid-in capital stock of subscribers other than the United States equals $50,000,000 the Corporation would retire dollar for dollar, out of such privately paid capital, the stock held by the Secretary of the Treasury at par plus accrued dividends, provided that no such stock could be retired if the net capital reserves, and surplus of the Corporation would thereby be reduced to an amount less than $150,000,000.

Subsection (d)

This subsection would provide that the preferred stock of the Government, in addition to its preferment as to dividends and assets would upon liquidation of the Corporation, share with other stockholders in any distribution of profits.

SECTION 308—BOARD OF DIRECTORS

This section would provide that the Corporation would have a board of five directors with terms ending in successive years, each member after the first appointees to serve for a period of 5 years. The Administrator would appoint all directors, but after the first appointees two of the five directors would be appointed by the Administrator from members of stockholding corporations or other representatives of housing cooperatives. The Administrator would have the power to designate a chairman, and to remove directors for cause. Directors could receive reasonable compensation for services and necessary expenses.

SECTION 309—MORTGAGE LOANS

Subsection (a)

The Corporation would be authorized under this subsection to make mortgage loans (including advances during construction) to a nonprofit cooperative ownership housing corporation or other nonprofit corporation authorized to provide housing if the Administrator certifies (1) that the borrower is a bona fide corporation of this character, (2) that the proposed housing project will meet a need for housing for families of moderate income, (3) that the proposed project will meet sound standards of design, construction, livability, and size for adequate family life, and (4) that the development and management of the project will be such as to promote the economies contemplated under the title. The borrower must also agree to establish and maintain rent schedules, satisfactory to the Corporation, which will permit the dwellings to be made available to families of moderate income, and to comply with other prescribed terms and conditions. If the borrower is a nonprofit corporation proposing to rent the dwellings in the project, it must agree to give certain prescribed preferences to families displaced by low-rent public housing or slum clearance projects and to families of veterans and servicemen of World War I or II.

Subsection (b)

This subsection would provide that the mortgage loan could not exceed the development cost of the housing project nor the amount which the Administrator determines to be the upper limit within which housing can be provided for families of moderate income in the locality at rentals or other charges within their means.

Subsection (c)

This subsection would require that the mortgage loan provide for complete amortization within 50 years by periodic payments, except that, in the case of projects refinanced within a period prescribed by the Corporation, the total period could be extended to 60 years. Interest would be at a fixed rate on unpaid balances, such rate to take into account the cost to the Corporation of its capital and borrowings plus its costs of operation and its reserves. Provisions could be made in the loan for deferment of principal and interest payments thereunder provided that such deferments could not extend the maturity of the loan for more than 3 years.

Subsection (d)

This subsection would permit the Corporation, subject to the provisions of this section, to determine the form, security, repayment, redemption, and other terms and conditions of the mortgage loan. In the case of a loan to a cooperative ownership housing corporation, the borrower would be required to have, to the extent permitted by State and local law, a priority in the purchase of the interest of each of its members in the event of sale of such interest.

Subsection (e)

This subsection would permit the borrower, with the consent of the Corporation, to pledge the contract or commitment of the Corporation to make a mortgage loan as security for a construction loan from private or other sources.

Subsection (f)

This subsection would authorize the Corporation to charge (in addition to any interest charges) up to 2½ percent of the principal amount of the mortgage loan for inspection and other services rendered the project during construction.

SECTION 310—OBLIGATIONS OF CORPORATION

This section would provide for the issuance by the Corporation on and after July 1, 1950, of obligations, guaranteed as to principal and interest by the United States, in an amount not exceeding $300,000,000, which amount could be increased on or after July 1, 1951, with the approval of the President, by additional amounts aggregating not more than $1,700,000,000. The total outstanding obligations of the Corporation could not in any event, however, exceed 15 times its capital stock, reserves, and surplus or the amount of the unpaid balance of the mortgages contracted for or held by it plus its cash on hand and on deposit and its investments.

SECTION 311—RESERVES, DIVIDENDS, AND INVESTMENT OF FUNDS

This section contains provisions for the establishment of reserves, including payments to a special reserve account for losses equal to one-eighth of 1 percent per annum of outstanding mortgage loans; for the payment of dividends; and for the investment of reserves and other funds of the Corporation.

SECTION 312—TAXES

This section would provide that real property and tangible personal property of the Corporation would be subject to State and local taxes and real property of the Corporation would be subject to special assessments for local improvements. The Corporation itself and its other property of all kinds would be exempt from Federal, State, and local taxes. Obligations of the Corporation would be exempt both as to principal and interest from State and local taxes except surtaxes, estate, inheritance, and gift taxes.

SECTION 313—PROTECTION OF LABOR STANDARDS

This section would require that not less than the salaries prevailing in the particular locality, as determined or adopted by the Administrator, be paid to all architects, technical engineers, etc., employed in the development, and to all maintenance laborers and mechanics employed in the administration, of the housing project. It would also provide that not less than the wages prevailing in the locality, as predetermined by the Secretary of Labor pursuant to the Bacon-Davis Act, should be paid to all laborers and mechanics employed in the development of the housing project, would make applicable the provisions of the kick-back statute, and would require that certain reports be made to the Secretary of Labor by contractors and subcontractors on the work.

SECTION 314—PENALTIES

This section contains appropriate criminal and penal provisions in connection with operations under the provisions of this act.

SECTION 315—DEFINITIONS

This section sets forth the necessary definitions of terms.

SECTION 316—GOVERNMENT CORPORATION CONTROL ACT

This section would make the necessary changes in the Government Corporation Control Act to include the National Mortgage Corporation for Housing Cooperatives as a mixed-ownership corporation thereunder.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION ACT

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I had intended introducing, at this same time, my bill concerned with the assessment to insured banks of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation which has been drafted in the Banking and Currency Committee. Now I intend to hold this bill and introduce it on Tuesday of next week.

After a careful study of the statutes under which the FDIC functions, it is clear that some of them are in need of modernization. I have discussed these changes with the Secretary of the Treasury and the Chairman of the FDIC. They have agreed to give the committee their recommendations for these technical changes in order that we may incorporate them in the bill which we have ready.

For the advance information of all those who may be interested, the complete bill will be introduced on Tuesday, and Senator ROBERTSON has agreed to hold hearings before his subcommittee beginning on Wednesday.

RESOLUTIONS OF SENATE DEMOCRATIC CONFERENCE ON DEATHS OF SENATOR BROUGHTON, OF NORTH CAROLINA, AND SENATOR MILLER, OF IDAHO.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD resolutions adopted by the Democratic Conference of the United States Senate on January 5, 1950, expressing deep appreciation of the distinguished service and great sense of loss at the passing of the Honorable J. MELVILLE BROUGHTON, of North Carolina, and the Honorable BERT H. MILLER, of Idaho.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DISPLACED PERSONS: FACTS VERSUS FICTION

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in the late summer of 1949 I received permission from the Senate to go to Europe on a mission to investigate displaced persons. The facts which were adduced during the numerous hearings conducted in various places in Europe will be most enlightening to the people of the United States, and, indeed, to the Congress of the United States. They will not only be enlightening, but in some respects they will be startling. They will set at naught many of the statements which have been made with reference to this highly controversial subject.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a preliminary statement based on my study and investigation of the question of displaced persons, as that subject is before the Congress at the present time.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 6, 1950.

DISPLACED PERSONS: FACTS VERSUS FICTION

(Statement by Senator PAT MCCARRAN, chairman of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary)

(Foreword)

As chairman of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, which has jurisdiction over immigration legislation, I have recently returned from a European investigation of the displaced-persons situation. The facts verify the information gathered by a special subcommittee of the Senate, of which I am chairman, which has over the course of the last 2½ years been studying our entire immigration and naturalization system. These facts point to the inescapable conclusion that the floodgates of this Nation are being pried open for the entrance of millions of aliens, from the turbulent populations of the entire world, who are seeking admission into the United States under the guise of displaced persons.

This movement is being facilitated by certain pressure groups in this country, which over the years have had as their ultimate objective the destruction of our immigration barriers. One pressure group has, during the course of the last 3 years, registered with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, lobby expenditures of approximately $1,000,000. This money has not, of course, been spent for the relief of displaced persons but solely for dissemination of propaganda designed to influence legislation to repeal the safeguards of our immigration laws. Unless the rank and file of the American people express themselves promptly and forthrightly to their representatives in the Congress, it is a certainty that the objective of these pressure groups will be accomplished.

WHO IS A DISPLACED PERSON?

At the end of the war the Allied armies in central Europe became the guardians of approximately 8,000,000 persons who had been displaced during the war. Within a few months after the war approximately 7,000,000 of these persons were repatriated to their native countries, leaving about 1,000,000 persons, who, because of fear of persecution, refused to return to their homelands. By the expiration date of our present displaced-persons law (June 30, 1950) there will remain only a few thousand such war-displaced persons in central Europe, other than the so-called hard core who because of social or physical disqualifications are ineligible for resettlement.

The constitution of the International Refugee Organization, however, embraces not only displaced persons who were displaced by the war in central Europe, but in addition, it embraces all persons in the entire world who are, or who may hereafter be, out of their country of nationality or former residence and who are unwilling to return. Some year or two after the war in central Europe there began and continues until the present time, a general migration from eastern Europe into the occupied areas of western Europe of hundreds of thousands of persons who, because of political and economic turmoil, have been leaving their homelands. The potential number of persons embraced in this second category has been estimated to be in the millions.

In addition to the displaced persons who are embraced by the International Refugee Organization, there are between fifteen and twenty million persons who are de facto displaced but who are not presently embraced by the International Refugee Organization. These persons include:

1. The German expellees, who were forcibly expelled from the countries of eastern Europe pursuant to the Potsdam agreement of August 1, 1945, and driven into Germany and Austria. These German expellees number from ten to fifteen million. Under the constitution of the International Refugee Organization the German expellees are expressly excluded from the concern of the International Refugee Organization.

2. The Greek displaced persons who were displaced from their homes by the Nazis in World War II or by the Communists in the Greek civil war. These Greek displaced persons number approximately 500,000 but are ineligible under the constitution of the International Refugee Organization because they are in their native land.

3. The Palestinian displaced persons, who were displaced from their homes in the Palestine War. These Palestinian displaced persons number approximately 1,000,000.

4. The Pakastanian displaced persons, who were displaced from their homes in the partition of India. It is estimated that these Pakastanian displaced persons number approximately 10,000,000.

5. Displaced persons in China, who are being displaced in the course of the civil war in China. The number of such persons is unknown but it is probable that they number several million.

HAS THE UNITED STATES TAKEN ITS FAIR SHARE OF DISPLACED PERSONS?

Unlike most countries of the world the United States operates under an immigration quota system whereby approximately 154,000 quota immigrants may be received annually for permanent residence, chiefly from European countries. In addition, immigrants are received for permanent residence on a nonquota immigration basis without any numerical limitation. This latter group consists chiefly of immigrants from the Western Hemisphere and of relatives of citizens of the United States. During the fiscal year 1948 there were admitted for permanent residence, 92,506 quota immigrants and 78,044 nonquota immigrants.

1. Displaced persons during the war years: Although our general immigration laws do not provide specific categories for displaced persons, reliable official and semiofficial estimates are that during the Nazi regime we received into the United States between 250,000 and 300,000 displaced persons for permanent residence and approximately 200,000 displaced persons for temporary stay.

2. Displaced persons under Presidential directive: Pursuant to a Presidential directive of December 22, 1945, approximately 44,000 displaced persons were admitted into the United States for permanent residence during the period ending on the effective date of the present displaced-persons law.

3. Displaced persons under the present displaced-persons law: The present law provides for the admission of an additional 205,000 displaced persons over a 2-year period, and also provides for adjusting the status to permanent residence of 15,000 displaced persons who have gained admission into the United States on a temporary basis.

4. Displaced persons under the general immigration law: Displaced persons are, of course, eligible, along with other aliens, for immigration into the United States under our general immigration laws. No reliable estimates are available concerning the number of displaced persons who have been admitted into the United States, since the Nazi regime, who have applied for admission not as displaced persons but as regular immigrants.

DOES OUR DISPLACED-PERSONS PROGRAM DISCRIMINATE AGAINST JEWS AND CATHOLICS?

1. Displaced persons during the war years: Of the hundreds of thousands of displaced persons who were admitted into the United States during the war years, it is reliably estimated that approximately four-fifths were of the Jewish faith.

2. Displaced persons under the Presidential directive: Under the President's directive of December 22, 1945, visas were issued to 23,594 displaced persons of the Jewish faith; 5,924 visas were issued to displaced persons of the Catholic faith, and 3,906 visas were issued to displaced persons of the Protestant faith.

3. Displaced persons under the displaced-persons law: As of November 30, 1949, there had been issued 127,866 visas pursuant to the displaced-persons law. Fifty-three thousand four hundred and two of the visas were to displaced persons of the Catholic faith; 33,479 were to displaced persons of the Jewish faith; 20,279 were to displaced persons of the Protestant faith; 19,283 were to displaced persons of the Greek Orthodox faith; and 1,423 were to displaced persons of unknown faith.

IS THE PRESENT CUT-OFF DATE FAIR?

The present displaced-persons law was designed to afford maximum relief to those persons who were displaced as a direct result of the war or shortly thereafter. Accordingly, the law prescribes a cut-off date of December 22, 1945, for eligibility. This is some 7 months after the termination of the war and is the same cut-off date which was used in the administration of the Presidential directive in order to distinguish between the war-displaced persons and the hundreds of thousands of persons who have voluntarily displaced themselves by migrating into the occupied areas since that date. It is obvious that any extension of the cut-off date will work to the detriment of those persons who were displaced by the war because their chances of immigration into the United States will be diluted by several hundred thousand. The Celler bill (H. R. 4567), which the pressure groups are trying to drive through the Senate, not only advances this cut-off date to January 1, 1949, but provides for the admission into the United States of some 15,000 displaced persons from behind the iron curtain who have not yet been displaced but may be displaced in the future. An official of our principal intelligence agency which is operating abroad has expressed the opinion that this provision of the Celler bill would constitute a dangerous threat to the security of the United States and would be another loophole for the infiltration of Communist agents.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE PRESENT DISPLACED-PERSONS LAW

I am confident, on the basis of my investigation, that there is a complete break-down in the administration of the law. Inadequate screening of applicants, with little or no regard for background, political beliefs, and predilections of applicants, has opened the gates to persons who will not become good citizens and who will become ready recruits in subversive organizations to tear down the democracy of the United States. My investigation has brought to light innumerable instances of wholesale fraud, misrepresentation, fictitious documents, and perjury resorted to by persons seeking displaced-persons status in order to qualify within the terms of the law. Let it be remembered that the Attorney General of the United States recently testified that an analysis of 4,984 of the more militant members of the Communist Party in the United States showed that 91.4 percent of the total were of foreign stock or were married to persons of foreign stock.

The present law contains provisions as a prerequisite to eligibility that there be job and housing assurances without displacing other persons from jobs and housing. The Displaced Persons Commission, in administering these provisions of the law, has been validating "blanket" assurances to certain groups with no independent check whatsoever in order to ascertain the validity of the assurances. The Displaced Persons Commission has even validated assurances for displaced persons which were made by other displaced persons already admitted into the United States.

Notwithstanding repeated evidences of fraud and misrepresentation, not a single displaced person who has thus far been admitted into the United States by virtue of such fraud and misrepresentation has been returned to Europe.

PROVISIONS OF H. R. 4567

H. R. 4567, which the pressure groups are trying to drive through the Senate:

1. Expands the definition of a displaced person so as to admit into the United States certain select groups from all over the world, but excludes Greek displaced persons, displaced persons of German blood, and other equally deserving groups, irrespective of their location.

2. Provides for the admission of 18,000 displaced persons who presently reside in the British Isles.

3. Extends the cut-off date to January 1, 1949, and thus dilutes the number of the present war-displaced-persons category by several hundred thousand.

4. Provides for the admission into the United States of 15,000 persons from behind the iron curtain, who have not yet been displaced but may be displaced in the future.

5. Provides that anyone who left the occupied areas of central Europe may return at any time and gain eligibility for immigration into the United States.

6. Sets aside 50 percent of the nonpreference portion of certain quotas for the exclusive use of displaced persons who have already been admitted into other countries of the world.

7. Removes from the present law the priority which is given to agricultural workers and their families. Although the statistics reveal that aliens generally, and displaced persons in particular, are congested in the large cities, H. R. 4567 would further intensify this problem.

8. Increases the number to be admitted to 339,000. This number is, of course, in addition to the number admissible under our general immigration system.

IMMIGRATION PROBLEMS OF THE UNITED STATES

Since the end of the war there has been a tremendous increase in the influx into the United States, both legally and illegally, of people from all over the world. There is at present a backlog of registered demand against the immigration quotas of over one million. During the fiscal year 1948, over 170,000 aliens were admitted into the United States for permanent residence. In addition, approximately one-half million persons were admitted into the United States from overseas presumably on a temporary basis, but many thousands of these persons have overstayed their periods of admission and are seeking to remain here permanently.

During the last session of the Congress, the Senate approved the adjustment of the status to permanent residence of over 3,000 cases of aliens who were admitted temporarily.

An indication of the scope of the problem of illegal entries is the fact that on the Mexican border alone apprehensions during the first 6 months of the 1949 fiscal year were at a rate of 25,000 a month. During the fiscal year 1948, there were apprehended on the Mexican border 193,852 illegal entrants.

During the fiscal year 1948, there were apprehended in the United States 4,353 seamen who had jumped ship and it is estimated by United States immigration officials that stowaways are arriving at the rate of approximately 100 per month. During the last year 412 smugglers of aliens were arrested, but, of course, the number which were actually smuggled into the United States is unknown.

The scope of the problem of illegal aliens is clearly set out by the fact that the number of forced departures from the United States for the last 5 years has exceeded the number of immigrants entering the country legally dur!_g that period.

Officials of the Immigration and Naturalization Service testified in the course of our investigation of the immigration and naturalization system, that if the manpower were available there would be over 500,000 investigations of potential illegal aliens in the United States in the present fiscal year.

Typical of the comments of the Immigration and Naturalization Service officers respecting investigations of illegal aliens is the following:

"We have little or no what we might call free-lance investigations; that is, to go out and try to find aliens who are illegally in the country."

A former American consul on the Canadian border estimated the number of illegal aliens in the United States to be from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000. The Immigration and Naturalization Service officials estimate that there are approximately 50,000 Cubans illegally in the United States in the Miami, Fla., immigration district. The immigration and naturalization officials in the Los Angeles area estimate that there are approximately 50,000 illegal aliens in the general vicinity of Los Angeles and that they are unable to keep control of them due to the lack of manpower.

WHAT CAN YOU DO ABOUT THE SITUATION?

The pressure groups have already succeeded in getting H. R. 4567 passed by the House of Representatives and the bill will be scheduled for debate in the Senate soon. The pressure groups are using a relatively few war-displaced persons, virtually all of whom are being resettled or repatriated, for the purpose of destroying our immigration barriers, to the end that this country will be inundated with a flood of aliens. With seemingly unlimited money these well-knit determined groups will suceed unless the patriotic American groups and the rank and file of the American people speak their minds firmly and promptly to the Congress. Your opinion and the opinion of your group, if expressed to your Senators, will help hold the dikes of our protective immigration system.

Mr. McCARRAN. I wish to say, Mr. President, that I shall have further and more particular statements, fully documented, to insert in the RECORD, and that I shall present the facts in speeches made on the floor of the Senate before very long.

DIFFICULTY IN OBTAINING INFORMATION FROM THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, as being indicative of some of the problems which the legislative branch of the Government has in obtaining information from the executive branch, I wish to have printed in the body of the RECORD a letter dated August 24, 1949, which I wrote to the Attorney General, asking for certain information relative to the Federal judiciary; a copy of the acknowledgment of my letter, dated August 30; a letter dated September 16, which I addressed to the Library of Congress Reference Service, seeking the information; their reply of September 21, saying that they were taking it up with the Attorney General's office; and a letter of January 4, 1950, from the Library of Congress Reference Service, saying that they still have not received the information from the Attorney General. I have not received the information to date.

I think it is high time that the legislative branch of the Government should receive some service in regard to information which it requests from the executive branch of the Government.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 24, 1949.

Hon. J. HOWARD MCGRATH,
The Attorney General,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: I would greatly appreciate your furnishing me with answers to the following questions:

Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I would greatly appreciate your furnishing me with the answers to the following questions:

1. Total number of Federal judges having life appointments.

2. Total number of present incumbent judges who have been appointed since the close of 1932, to include—

(a) United States.

(b) Territories.

(c) Lower courts of the District of Columbia.

3. Total number of Republicans appointed to judgeships since the close of 1932, to include—

(a) United States.

(b) Territories.

(c) Lower courts of the District of Columbia.

4. The number and names of the Republican judges appointed since 1933 to the Federal appeals courts.

5. The total number of Federal judicial vacancies created by act of Congress since March 1933.

Thanking you for this information, I am,

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND.

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
Washington, D. C., September 21, 1949.

Hon. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR KNOWLAND: With reference to your letter of September 16, 1949, requesting five items of information relating to Federal judges, we have requested, without disclosing your name, that the Department of Justice compile the answers. We will transmit the report to your office as soon as it is received.

In past instances where requests of this nature have been made by Members and committees of Congress, we have suggested that the inquiry be sent to the Department of Justice as that office has the pertinent files and information with which to prepare an official statement or report. Your questions relate to matters which are not available through public records and can only be answered by reference to the private files maintained by the Department of Justice.

Partial information relating to appointees to the Federal judiciary who were confirmed could be compiled by checking the pages listed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD index under the heading "Executive Nominations and Confirmations—Judiciary—Confirmed." In the event that the Department of Justice declines to furnish the complete and accurate information as requested, do you wish us to do what we can as indicated?

Sincerely yours,

ERNEST S. GRIFFITH,
Director, Legislative Reference Service.

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
Washington, D. C., January 4, 1950.

Hon. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR KNOWLAND: With further reference to your letter of September 16, 1949, requesting five items of information relating to Federal judges and our reply of September 21, 1949, we wish to state that we are still awaiting a report from the Department of Justice.

By letter of October 3, 1949, we were advised by the Office of the Assistant to the Attorney General that statistics were in the process of being compiled and that we would be furnished the requested information as soon as possible. In view of the lapse of time, do you wish us to send an additional request to the Department of Justice requesting that the compilation be expedited if possible?

Sincerely yours,

ERNEST S. GRIFFITH,
Director, Legislative Reference Service.

THE COAL SHORTAGE

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, were it not for the urgency of the situation, I would be loathe to consume, the time of the Senate to make these remarks. But, Mr. President, the people of my State, and perhaps those in other States, are in a desperate plight. They are urgently in need of coal.

From every section of Indiana, from public officials, from coal dealers, from hospitals, and from public institutions have come urgent pleas that I give them assistance in obtaining coal.

Mr. President, while this condition needs immediate and decisive action, yet to me the situation is so needless. One directive from the office of the President of the United States or one action on the part of the National Labor Relations Board could bring immediate termination of this desperate lack of coal, which daily is further endangering the health and the lives of the people of my State.

I wish to read just a few of the telegrams which have come to me. From one of the largest coal dealers in Indianapolis:

> Entirely out of coal with customers in dire need. Please give coal situation priority over less important matters.

From the mayor of Indianapolis, Mayor Al Feeney, comes the following:

> Coal situation this city critical. Prompt action necessary if acute suffering is to be avoided. Respectfully urge you to exert every effort to see that coal problem is given priority as emergency and all less important matters shelved until definite action is forthcoming to relieve coal shortage.

A retail coal dealer who provides St. Catherine's Hospital in East Chicago, Ind., informed me in a telegram Wednesday that that institution that day had a 5-day supply of coal on hand, with no prospect of obtaining more.

The president of the Illinois Central Railroad has telegraphed me repeatedly about the dangerous conditions facing numerous cities along the route of his railroad because of the lack of coal.

Mr. President, this condition is entirely unnecessary. The Eightieth Congress in 1947 placed at the disposal of the President of the United States of America a means of avoiding just such a situation as the one which confronts the Nation today.

I am not debating the merits or demerits of the controversy existing between the United Mine Workers of America and the mine operators. That is a matter which can be and should be settled across the bargaining table. But, to paraphrase an old saying, "Somebody seems to be fiddling while the people of this Nation are freezing to death."

I do not know what action the Congress of the United States can take, other than that provided for by the Taft-Hartley Act. I am not concerned about the constitutionality of that act; but the fact remains that the law is on the statute books, and it is the duty of the President of the United States to administer the laws of the United States until such time as they are declared unconstitutional by the courts.

I am informed that the general counsel for the National Labor Relations Board is conducting an investigation to determine the advisability of invoking the injunction provision of the Taft-Hartley law in order to alleviate this critical condition. Why should such an investigation be necessary? We face the fact that people of this Nation are cold, and they are cold because they have no coal. They have no coal because one man in this great country has sent out word that the miners shall not produce the coal which is so vitally needed, not only for the health of the people of our country but to keep the wheels of industry running.

Frankly, I do not know the answer; but I think it is time the Congress of the United States does something to correct the situation.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute, which has been submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], in behalf of himself and other Senators.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I wish to address myself to the question pending before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont is recognized.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, in considering the pending proposed legislation, we should attempt to determine who, if anyone, will be benefited if the bill before us is enacted; who, if anyone, will be injured; and whether the benefits to be derived from its passage will outweigh any injuries incurred.

The interested parties in the case before us are, first, the producers of raw materials for the manufacture of both oleomargarine and dairy products; second, the manufacturers; third, the consumers of oleomargarine and dairy products. And then we must consider the effect of such legislation on our national economy and our national welfare. For the purpose of this discussion, I shall leave the manufacturers and processors pretty much out of the picture.

It goes without saying that the real backers of this bill, the oleo interests, seek to capture that part of the consumer's market which has heretofore been enjoyed by the butter producers. On one side we have a compact group of a half dozen oleo manufacturers enjoying a near monopoly, and closely associated by a common purpose. On the other hand, we have several hundred thousand manufacturers of dairy and creamery butter, very loosely organized in an endeavor to retain a market for their products, of which they have already lost a considerable part.

Let me say at the outset that my State depends upon the production of dairy products for approximately 78 percent of its entire agricultural income. If I do what I can to protect the largest single industry of my State from a totally unfair attempt to injure it, I shall be responding to a perfectly natural human instinct.

In considering this legislation, several facts stand out as being axiomatic.

First, oleo as manufactured these days is not harmful to human beings.

It doubtless has some food value, although a comparison of the food values of oleo and butter is still a matter of dispute.

Oleo can be sold much cheaper than butter, and its sale should not be prohibited by law.

Many farmers, including dairy farmers in the fluid milk area, use oleo on their own tables, largely because of its lower cost.

Last of all, in holding back huge supplies of cream during the early spring and summer months of 1948, thereby forcing the price of butter to nearly $1 a pound, the dairy interests themselves provided the oleo manufacturers with the most potent argument they have had in the campaign to secure the passage of the bill before us. It does not matter that the dairy interests took a severe loss on the cream which was withheld. The fact is that the consumer was aroused sufficiently to support questionable proposed legislation, not because the consumer preferred oleo on the table, but because it appeared to be the only means of bringing the price of butter within reach of even the middle-income groups.

Now that the price of butter has dropped to a reasonable level, the pressure for the passage of this legislation has largely abated, so far as consumers are concerned. As a matter of fact, I have had only one communication, this year favoring the enactment of the pending measure, and that came from an oleomargarine dealer.

I fear that the consumer has been badly misled by the proponents of oleo. A great many consumers believe that oleo could be purchased much cheaper if the Federal tax were removed and if it were given a free and unbridled market. This belief is, of course, contrary to the facts.

Except in a few States which have a high or prohibitive tax on the sale of oleo, the consumer has been paying one-fourth of a cent a pound tax. There is also a tax of 10 cents a pound on colored oleo, but this does not apply to that which is colored by the housewife herself. Altogether, the taxes on oleo paid to the Federal Government amount to approximately $16,000,000 a year. Probably the tax on transportation alone amounts to more on a pound of oleo than the tax on the oleo itself.

There is no assurance that if the 10 cents a pound tax on colored oleo is removed, the consumer will benefit thereby. In fact, just the opposite is indicated.

I hold in my hand a copy of an advertisement appearing in the El Paso Times, in which a local provision store offers uncolored oleo at 25 cents a pound and colored oleo at 55 cents a pound or 30 cents a pound above the price of the uncolored product, even though the Federal tax amounts to only 10 cents.

This is an indication of what Mrs. Consumer may expect in the event that oleomargarine is permitted to be sold unrestricted, uncontrolled, and in the exact color and appearance of butter. She may expect that the price of colored oleomargarine will be held just as near the price of butter as competitive conditions will allow. In view of the fact that the oleomargarine market is dominated by only a half dozen concerns, that competitive situation is not likely to become acute.

In other words, while the untrammelled traffic in oleo or synthetic butter may and probably will result in a sharp decline in the sales of butter, it will also probably result in an increase in the price of the oleo.

It is also entirely possible that pure butter will be driven from a large part of the market just as it has been in certain sections of the country today and been supplanted by blends of various fats and oils.

It is entirely possible that dairy interests themselves may engage in the manufacture of blended table fats in an effort to retain part of the market which they now have.

We may discount completely any arguments that the pending bill is proposed in behalf of the consumer.

If the Congress sincerely desires to lower consumer costs, it would do far better to remove the tax on transportation of food commodities which today amounts to many, many times the tax on oleomargarine.

However, it is not the removal of the tax on oleomargarine which concerns us here.

The dairy interests have readily agreed to the removal of all taxes and I, myself, believe that excise taxes affecting food commodities should be removed at the earliest possible moment, including the tax on oleomargarine itself.

What concerns me is that the oleo manufacturing interests are determined to secure the enactment of such legislation as will enable them to palm off their product for genuine butter on an unsuspecting public.

It is true that any law Congress may enact will require the package containing oleo to plainly show it, but it is also true that as soon as that product is removed from the package a great majority of the consuming public will never know whether they were being served oleo or butter.

Already the manufacturers are putting up the oleo product to look exactly like the dairy product in each area of the country in which it is sold.

If butter is put up in thin packages, then oleo is sold in thin packages.

If the market demands deep yellow butter, oleo is colored deep yellow.

If the market demands uncolored butter, as much of the country does today, then the oleo is colored to look exactly like uncolored butter.

The law permits oleomargarine to be flavored to taste like butter, to be artificially fortified by vitamins and finally to be preserved or embalmed as some might say with benzoate of soda or other preservative.

Furthermore, the oleo manufacturer of today is not required to put upon the package a statement of the ingredients contained in the product.

Certainly, the consumer is entitled to know what is in the oleo upon her table.

It may be made of pure cottonseed oil. It may be made from soybean oil. It may be made from coconut oil. It may be made from fish oil, or it may be made from lard, for the oleo law permits the use of almost any kind of fat in its manufacture.

Certainly, no legislation should be passed permitting the promiscuous and unrestricted sale of synthetic or imitation butter without a requirement for naming the ingredients used in its manufacture.

Furthermore, if this bill were promoted in the interest of the consumer, we should first remove the almost absolute protection which the oleo manufacturer has against any imported product. This amounts to a tariff of 7 cents a pound and a special import tax of 15 cents a pound. Thus, the oleo manufacturing monopoly is protected to the extent of 22 cents a pound as compared with a tariff protection of 7 cents a pound given the butter producer.

Moreover, if a low-cost product for the consumer's table is the objective of this bill, its promoters should advocate the removal of the tax on coconut oil. Coconut oil is probably the cheapest material from which good oleo can be made.

It is today selling for 14 cents a pound as compared with 11 cents for cottonseed oil, but the coconut industry has not recovered from the ravages of the war, and, furthermore, coconut oil, except that from the Philippines which takes a lower rate, is subject to a 6 cents a pound levy before it can be used in the manufacture of oleomargarine.

If the professed champions of the consumer really had her interest at heart, they would be seeking now to remove the coconut oil tax of 6 cents a pound.

Four pounds of coconut oil will make 5 pounds of oleomargarine.

In other words, with the tax removed, the ingredients for the manufacture of a pound of oleomargarine from coconut oil today would cost in the neighborhood of 8 cents. As the coconut industry recovers from the effects of the war, this cost will be considerably lower. I am almost certain that if the oleo manufacturing interests gain the advantages which they seek through the pending legislation, their next step will be to seek the removal of import taxes on raw materials, so that still cheaper oils can be used.

I am not advocating the removal of the coconut oil tax. I am simply pointing out that if the promoters of this bill were operating in the behalf of the consumer, that they could find better ways of promoting her interest than they are now using.

The purpose of the exceptionally high tax on coconut oil imports is primarily to protect the producers of cottonseed oil.

There is nothing wrong in undertaking to protect the interests of our agricultural producers, but let us not masquerade under the guise of promoting consumer interest in this case.

I desire now to consider briefly the effect of the proposed legislation on the American dairy farmer.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. FULLRIGHT. I am not quite clear concerning the Senator's statement. It is a fact, is it not, that margarine today sells in retail stores at approximately one-half the price of butter?

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator is entirely correct. It is selling for 35 cents. While I do not know what the retail price of butter is, I assume it is in the neighborhood of from 68 to 70 cents, with the Government floor of 60 cents.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. So there is some advantage, at least moneywise, to the consumer in the purchase of oleomargarine, is there not?

Mr. AIKEN. I do not deny for an instant that there are families who do not have money with which to buy butter, who ought to be able to purchase oleomargarine. What I am protesting against is the sale of oleomargarine in such form that most of the consumers will think they are actually getting butter.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I think the facts are not exactly as the Senator has agreed. As I recall, the evidence showed that recently in California, depending upon where the oleo interests could impact the market, they sold oleomargarine at prices ranging from 15 to 55 cents a pound.

Mr. AIKEN. Cottonseed oil is selling for 11 cents a pound today. I understand that 4 pounds of oil will make 5 pounds of oleomargarine. That would make the cost of the raw materials entering into the manufacture of oleo between 9 and 10 cents a pound; so it probably could be sold for less.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. It has been sold for less. In fact in California it has been sold for as low as 15 cents a pound, giving an extra coupon for another pound. The purpose of that, of course, is to take over the market. At one place when a pound of oleo was sold what they called a fountain pen was given as a bonus. That represents recent tactics in California.

Mr. AIKEN. I have heard that one company in California sold a pound of oleo and a $1 fountain pen for 30 cents, and that in the pound of oleo the customer found a coupon entitling him to another pound of oleo. Whether it included another fountain pen, I was not informed. The competitive situation is very acute in California and it was to the California trade to which I referred yesterday when I mentioned the report that certain manufacturing concerns were actually placing on the oleo boxes pictures of dairy barns. I can readily understand that, because I know of many cases in which imitation maple sirup is sold in containers bearing the picture of a sugar house or a maple grove.

Mr. TOBEY rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. The Senator just said that 4 pounds of coconut oil will make 5 pounds of oleo; did he not?

Mr. AIKEN. That is correct.

Mr. TOBEY. What other items besides coconut oil are used in its manufacture?

Mr. AIKEN. Oleomargarine is required to contain 80 percent of fat. The other items would be skimmed-milk powder, water, salt, and flavoring. Butter is permitted to contain a certain percentage of water and salt, but not flavoring. I think water and salt only are permitted to be used in butter. Of course, the water could not well be taken out of it, for there would be left nothing but a brick, which people would not like.

Mr. WILEY. Skimmed milk is used; is it not?

Mr. AIKEN. Some skimmed milk is used in the manufacture of oleo. The manufacturers, however, are not required to indicate on the package that skimmed-milk powder is used in its manufacture.

I was saying I should like to consider the effect of this legislation on the American dairy farmer.

Including meat products, the dairy herd accounts for about 22 percent of the agricultural income of the United States. It is far and away the most important branch of agriculture. For the year 1948 the dollar value of the dairy industry of the United States was almost exactly the same as that of the automobile industry, which was in the neighborhood of $7,000,000,000. It is far and away the most important market for industrial manufactured goods. It has been repeatedly said on the floor that 20 percent of the persons who live on the farms of the United States purchase approximately 40 percent of the industrial output of the Nation. The dairy farmer, of course, purchases far more in proportion to his numbers than do other types of farmers.

Twenty-six and one-tenth percent of the milk produced on dairy farms goes into the manufacture of butter. Perhaps I should more properly say that the cream from that amount of milk goes into the manufacture of butter. In some sections of the country most of the milk is produced for the purpose of providing cream for the manufacture of butter and skim milk for the production of veal, pork, poultry, and other animal products.

Approximately two and a half million American farmers are milk producers. That is nearly a million more than the number of farmers engaged in any other agricultural production.

Dairying is the most stable field of employment for farm labor. It provides an enormous business for transportation companies, and is, as I have indicated, the greatest consumer market for industrial products, including manure spreaders, tractors, fertilizers, and other industrial products. Dairy farmers also purchase and consume a large percentage of the grain production of the Nation. Whatever affects the dairy industry of the United States affects the entire domestic economy.

Dairying is a soil-building branch of agriculture, not a soil-depleting crop, such as soybeans or cotton.

The most prosperous agricultural areas of America are those areas where dairying is generally practiced. I refer to those areas or regions as a whole, and not solely to the dairy farmer, for the local merchant, the doctor, the school teacher, the garage man, and the local laboring people are all interdependent, and their fortunes rise or fall with the fortunes of the dairying communities in which they are located.

In many areas the primary purpose of dairying is not the production of cream for butter, but the production of fluid milk for the consumer market.

In most parts of the country, health regulations promulgated by city officials require extraordinary expenditures on the part of the farmer in order to produce milk of the highest quality and under sanitary conditions. For instance, in the New England and New York milk shed, which includes my State, stables must have window space equal to 10 percent of the total wall space in the stable.

Milk must be cooled before 9 o'clock in the morning, which necessitates the installation of expensive electric refrigeration machinery on the farm.

Separate milk houses must be constructed at a specified distance from the stable.

All cows must be tested for diseases, so that no disease can be transmitted to the consumer through milk.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. What percentage of the income from dairying in the Senator's State comes from the production of butter?

Mr. AIKEN. Very little of it. Vermont is not a butter-manufacturing State. We are affected seriously by the price of butter in other States, however.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. What the Senator is really talking about is the conditions required to be observed in the production of fluid milk.

Mr. AIKEN. I shall come to that subject very shortly.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Is it not true that the percentage of the dairy income from butter is less than 1 percent of the total dairy income?

Mr. AIKEN. I think the Senator is probably correct. I do know that when the price of butter in the Midwest goes to pieces, the producers there dump their cream on the New England market to break our price for fluid milk.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I noticed this morning that the Senator from Iowa was objecting to restrictions against the transportation of milk here. Perhaps the answer to the question is to restrict any interstate shipment of milk, in order to protect the market.

Mr. AIKEN. Those restrictions are not imposed by law, but are imposed by regulations of the city boards of health, such as New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and, I assume, Washington, and most of the other principal markets in the fluid-milk-producing area.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator would not think, I suppose, that it would be a good thing for our economy as a whole to restrict the shipment of fluid milk; in other words, to prohibit its interstate shipment.

Mr. AIKEN. That would be impracticable.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. And undesirable.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. Is it not true that the Senator from Vermont, in presenting this subject this morning, is not motivated by the fact that he is a Senator from Vermont, but that he has a deep interest in the dairying industry of the country, and is speaking for the entire industry?

Mr. AIKEN. I stated at the start that I represent, with due respect to the Senator from Wisconsin, the most intensive dairy State in the Union, a State which depends upon dairy products for approximately 78 percent of its agricultural income. I may be prejudiced. Let us admit that. We are all prejudiced. Let us agree to that, also, so that it will not sound one-sided.

Mr. TOBEY. It was Edmund Burke who stated that a Senator was primarily a Senator of the United States rather than a Senator from the particular State which elects him. Does the Senator from Vermont concur in that statement?

Mr. AIKEN. I concur in that statement of Edmund Burke, but I also maintain that there never was a Member of the Senate who forgot where his home was.

Mr. TOBEY. If he stayed here more than one term.

Mr. AIKEN. If he did forget, he ceased to be a Senator.

Mr. TOBEY. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. AIKEN. I have here a copy of the regulations of the Boston board of health, consisting of approximately 12 pages, which regulations must be observed in the production of fluid milk for the Boston market. In addition to the regulations which I have already mentioned, there are others. All utensils used in a dairy barn must be clean and must be sterilized, or the milk cannot be sold. The manure must be moved a specified distance. The persons who work in the dairy must always wear clean clothing and be free from contagious diseases themselves. If one has tuberculosis he cannot even be employed in the handling of milk from the producer to the consumer.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. THYE. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows whether the same restrictive measures are imposed upon those persons who produce the oils, vegetable fats, or any of the animal fats going into the production of oleomargarine?

Mr. AIKEN. Not that I know of. I suppose the manufacturers themselves have to comply with sanitary regulations, but so far as the producers of the raw materials are concerned, I do not know of any such regulations.

Mr. THYE. The restrictions about which the Senator has spoken are very much like the regulations covering the production of milk for the Twin Cities. The producers of fats and oils which go into the manufacture of oleomargarine up until the time they are concentrated and processed have no such restrictive measures imposed upon them comparable to those which are imposed in connection with the production of dairy products. Is that correct?

Mr. AIKEN. I do not know of any.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I do not think there is any question about the regulations with regard to fluid milk, and it seems to me the discussion is wholly irrelevant to butter, because the Senator knows very well that in those States which are primarily producers of butter, of which the Senator's State is not one, there are no regulations controlling the production of milk for butterfat. There are no regulations whatever in regard to the conditions under which the cream, which goes into the butter, is produced. The Senator has admitted that less than 1 percent of the milk produced under such fine conditions goes into butter.

Mr. AIKEN. There is more than that today, because each year a greater part of the country is coming under the regulations of the city boards of health. In other words, they are reaching out in different directions to get fluid milk, and in the area represented by the able Senator from Minnesota, the able Senator from Wisconsin, and in other great producing States, I think it will be found that the dairy farmers must produce cream for butter under the same conditions, because they produce for the manufacture of butter and also for the fluid milk market. There are some areas, I believe, in which they produce cream to be manufactured into butter, but I know that they do not come under such strict regulations as they would if they were producing for both the fluid milk market and the butter market.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If the Senator will yield, that is exactly correct, wherever they can sell it in the fluid milk market, and they do more and more, as I think I have pointed out, because that is where the profit is. There is no one attacking the dairy industry. Its real progress is through the sale of fluid milk, not butter. That is the whole point I made day before yesterday. I think the Senator is correct in his statement.

Mr. AIKEN. Two years ago the Senator's statement might have been accurate, but today the dairy farmers are producing less and less for the fluid-milk market, and produce a larger percentage of milk which has to be used in byproducts. I shall point that out very soon.

I have mentioned the regulations merely to show the expensive costs in equipping a dairy farm for the production of dairy products. I wish to point out what this means to the manufacturing interests of the country, the transportation interests, the truck manufacturers, and so on.

After having gone to an expense of several thousand dollars to qualify a dairy farm for the production of fluid milk for the city market, the producer must then try to gage his production as nearly as possible to meet the consumer demand.

No one so far has devised any means of keeping cows, even those which freshen in the fall, from giving more milk during the spring months than they do during November and December.

Therefore, if the city consumer is to be assured an adequate supply of milk through the fall and winter months, it is necessary for the farmer to keep enough cows so that a considerable surplus is produced during spring and early summer. In fact, a surplus is being produced right now in the Boston milk area. Only about 60 percent of the production is being consumed in the form of fluid milk. There has been an exceptionally favorable season, as there was a year ago, for the production of milk, with late fall pasturing, good grain, and warm weather. So, ordinarily, the farmer must keep more cows than he needs during the spring and summer in order to supply the consumer with what milk she needs during the fall months.

The consumer will not buy this surplus, because she does not need and does not see why she should buy twice as much milk during May as she does in November. Therefore, other markets have to be found for the surplus produced during the flush season.

This surplus is used in manufacturing powdered milk, cheese, ice cream, and chocolate, but the most important market for it is in the manufacture of butter.

As the Senator from New Hampshire has said, that is not true of New England, where the surplus is used in the manufacture of powdered milk and other products.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEAHY in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. THYE. Referring to the percentage that goes into fluid milk, as well as manufactured products, in the area of the Twin Cities, Minneapolis and St. Paul, in Minnesota—and they are fairly good-sized cities—we need only about 25 or 30 miles of an area about the two cities to supply all the fluid milk that is consumed in those cities. The balance of the producers in the State are dependent entirely upon the creameries to process the butterfat into butter and sell it in that manner, and then to process the skim milk into skim milk powder and sell the powder. That is their only outlet. That is true of Minnesota, and the same is true of Wisconsin to some extent, and wherever there is only one outlet, namely, through the manufacture of butterfat into powder. If the butter market is destroyed, it will result in stopping the dairy operations on all those farms, and they are going to have to turn to some other type of crop.

While I do not wish to impose upon the time of the Senator from Vermont, I would say to the very able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] that he knows of the splendid growth of dairy farms in his own State and in the deep South, because they have recognized that the dairy industry is the best type of soil conserving in which any farmer can engage, and I am quite surprised that some of his good diversified farm operators in his State have not taken him to task for sponsoring the legislation he is sponsoring.

Mr. AIKEN. No doubt they have.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator's description of conditions in Wisconsin is simply not accurate. Statistics from the Bureau of Agricultural Economics were introduced a few days ago. The Senator from Wisconsin is present and does not deny that less than 2 percent of the milk referred to goes into butter. The reason why Wisconsin is so prosperous in the dairy business is not because the producers sell the milk in the form of butter, but sell it in the form of cheese and fluid milk. That is all brought out in the testimony. They ship it to New York and as far south as Houston in tank cars.

The Senator certainly does not want any interstate restriction on the shipment of cheese or fluid milk. The fact is that those engaged in the dairy industry, as distinguished from the butter industry, want to promote the sale of it in the most profitable way, that is, fluid milk, cheese, dried milk, ice cream. The least profitable way in which a farmer can sell his milk is in the form of butter. In only a few States, such as Minnesota and Iowa—they are the outstanding two States—has there been an apparent refusal to see the benefits which arise from the sale of milk in forms other than as butter. Practically every other State has sought to emphasize the sale of fluid milk, and I am for that. In my State the most profitable way to sell milk is to such industries as Pet Milk, Carnation Milk, Avoset Cream, in the form of cheese, in the form of ice cream, and in the form of dried milk. We have Carnation factories and Pet Milk factories. That is the way to have a profitable dairying industry. In Minnesota and Iowa, apparently, they have not been able to market their milk in the forms which are most profitable to the farmers.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, if we listen to the Senator from Arkansas long enough we will come to the conclusion that there is not any butter in the United States, because nobody makes from the milk he produces more than 1 or 2 percent of butter.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. There is too much butter at the present high price. The Government has had to buy a hundred million dollars' worth.

Mr. AIKEN. The Department of Agriculture advises me that 26.1 percent—I do not know how they figure the one-tenth of a percent—of all the milk produced in the United States goes into the manufacture of butter, or at least that the cream from the milk does.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. THYE. I should like to make reply to the reference made by the able Senator from Arkansas to the small percentage of butterfat that is made into butter in the State of Wisconsin. Wisconsin is a very short distance from the Twin Cities in Minnesota, and the Wisconsin producers have qualified themselves to produce grade-A milk, and they are constantly begging the Twin City Milk Producers' Association to allow them to become either a part of the Twin City Milk Producers' Association as a group, or that they might supply milk.

Oftentimes in the short production season of the year the Twin City Milk Producers' Association, which does supply the milk for the Twin Cities, do buy from Wisconsin producers, because fluid milk sales are by far the most profitable. But with reference to Wisconsin's having made so much money in the sale of cheese, there was a time when cheese was a drug on the market in the entire United States. Up until the war demands, cheese was not profitable. When one went into many communities he found the cheese factories with their doors shut and their windows boarded up, and the vats had already deteriorated or been taken out and used for water tanks, or some other use. Those cheese factories were no longer producing cheese. That was true in Minnesota and Wisconsin. Everyone was clamoring for the fluid milk market. Wisconsin was in a more favorable position than some of the other States, because the great metropolitan center of Chicago is bounded by water on one side, and therefore Wisconsin could sell a great deal of its milk to the Chicago milk market.

So the fact of the matter is that butter is the end sale of such a large portion of our milk in the United States that if we destroy the butter market, we do tremendous damage. I call attention to the wisdom of our forefathers some half a century ago, when they imposed the tax, which has withstood the arguments that have been made in the Senate Chamber since 1902; and there have been some able men arguing for the oleomargarine industry since it was first produced and since the tax was imposed. But the wisdom of our forefathers was able to withstand the pressure, and if we are instrumental in removing the tax and permitting oleomargarine to go into the market unrestricted as a free competitor with the butter, we will regret the day.

I am not speaking this way because I myself am a producer of butter products, but any Senator can go into his own State—and I beg the Senator from Vermont to forgive me for taking so much of his time——

Mr. AIKEN. That is all right.

Mr. THYE. The Senator from Arkansas can go into his own splendid State, or he can go down into Tennessee, Alabama, or any of those States, and he will find that the extension people, the soil conservationists, will all point to farm units where they have successfully been able to reestablish the growth of grass, legume crops, on soils that have been so badly eroded or depleted by the growing of row crops, such as soybeans, cotton, and tobacco that the land will no longer produce as it should. Here is the educational branch of the Department of Agriculture, such as the Extension Service or the PMA, which have successfully built up depleted lands by the use of fertilizer, and secured a catch of grass, and then they proudly point to the dairy herds that consume the grass in the form of pasturage or in the form of hay, and they say, "We have rebuilded this land, we have given it a rebirth, so to speak, and look at that fine dairy herd that is out there."

Well, what are they going to do with that dairy herd if the butter market is destroyed? They cannot find a market that will take the fluid milk. There will simply be no expansion in their dairy operations if the butter market is destroyed. That is the argument, as I see it. It is not a question of food value. There is just as much nutritive value in a pound of white oleomargarine as there is in the colored.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield briefly. I should like to continue with my arguments.

Mr. WILEY. I shall be very brief.

Some mention has been made of Wisconsin. While we do produce twice as much milk as the next two milk-producing States, we also produce 8 percent of the butter produced in the Nation. But, as suggested by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE], practically one-third of all the milk produced in the United States goes into butter. Just think of that, Mr. President. The figures are from 30 percent to 31 percent. There we have the nub of the whole question. If the butter market is taken over, economic and political chaos will result.

Mr. AIKEN. I think we had better have a reconciliation of figures. The Senator from Wisconsin says that from 30 to 31 percent of the milk produced goes into butter, whereas I have stated that the Department of Agriculture says that 26.1 percent of the milk produced goes into butter. I am sure the Senator from Wisconsin is using the annual figures, whereas I am using the present-time figures.

Mr. WILEY. The figures come from the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. AIKEN. I think the difference results from the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin uses the annual figures, whereas I use the current percentage figures.

Before I proceed with my argument again, I should like to say, although it is probably not important to do so, that 1.2 percent of the Vermont dairy farmers' income comes from butter manufactured within the State, but by far the greater part of Vermont cream used in manufacturing butter is processed outside the State after it is delivered to the city market, and is found to be surplus or class 2 milk.

But this bill, Mr. President, I believe, strikes a solar-plexis blow at the use of surplus cream for the manufacture of butter. Consequently, if this market is destroyed or a major part of it taken away, the farmer will then be confronted with the alternative of reducing his production so as to only meet the demand during the flush season of the year, leaving the market short of fluid milk for the fall and early winter or else dumping the surplus on whatever market he can find, depending upon Government to make up the loss through subsidization.

If the first alternative is used, the consumer may look forward to definitely higher prices for milk during the months of shortage.

If the second alternative is resorted to, then certainly the consumer may look forward to increased tax bills in order to subsidize an adequate production of milk during these short months.

May I point out, too, another way in which a blow at the butter market will hit the consumer squarely in the pocketbook?

According to figures just given me by the Department of Agriculture, 42 percent dressed weight of the beef and veal produced in the United States comes from milk-producing animals.

Mr. WILEY. How much?

Mr. AIKEN. Forty-two percent is the figure given me by the Department of Agriculture day before yesterday.

Mr. THYE. That is correct.

Mr. WILEY. That varies.

Mr. AIKEN. It varies from time to time I suppose, but those figures are 2 days old.

If we eliminate a considerable part of the meat production now coming from milk-producing herds, the consumer will be faced with a dwindling supply of beef and veal as well as a dwindling supply or much higher prices for pork and poultry products which are raised to a considerable extent on the skim milk from the dairy farms.

I wish every consumer knew these facts, but it is almost impossible to counteract the multi-million-dollar campaign of misrepresentation by the oleo interests.

I now come to the final phase of my argument against this bill as it comes from the committee.

I know the proponents say that the bill protects butter against the sale of the synthetic product.

They claim that an adequate appropriation will be made to enforce the law so that oleo cannot be sold and served as butter.

I take little stock in such claims.

I know that if oleo is permitted to be sold as an exact imitation of butter, without restriction, any attempt to control the situation by law is doomed to failure.

At present the Food and Drug Administration has approximately $4,000,000 a year to enforce the laws coming under its jurisdiction. Under the pending bill it is proposed to give this agency $5,000,000 more to enforce the oleomargarine law.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. THYE. Could the Senator foresee how the Federal Government would police all the public eating places in Washington as of today noon, to determine if there were any infraction of the law which is now proposed to be passed, which would eliminate all restrictions, and which would provide that those serving oleomargarine must serve it in a certain shape? How would the authorities be able to go about policing all of the eating places in the city of Washington and in all other large cities, to determine whether a plain square pat of spread which was served was butter, or whether it was in fact oleomargarine served in place of butter?

Mr. AIKEN. It is proposed to inspect each eating place once a year. To think that such provision will amount to anything in preventing widespread fraud on the American people is absurd.

When all the agencies of law enforcement which the Government possesses fail to keep the leading hotels of Washington from serving corn sirup as pure maple sirup, what hope is there that these agencies will be any more effective in preventing the serving of oleo as butter in a million eating places of the Nation?

I know what has happened in the case of maple sirup. Exactly the same thing that will happen if the indiscriminate sale of oleo in exact imitation of butter is permitted.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. THYE. I should like to make a comment respecting the violation of certain food laws. I wonder how many persons have gone to the food laboratory of any one of the States and have seen the samples of food that had been adulterated that have been picked up by the food inspectors? State food inspectors or Federal food inspectors often find that violations of the law have occurred, and attempts made to defraud the public in respect to the food it consumes.

Having been connected with one of the regulatory bodies in my State, and having been in charge of food inspectors for several years, and having had problems of adulteration and fraud in connection with food brought to my desk, I do know that there are many violations of the food laws, and I would say that a law requiring serving oleomargarine in a triangular-shaped pat and requiring that a sign be placed on the wall of the restaurant stating that oleomargarine is served in that manner, would have no more regulatory force or be no more of a safeguard to the consuming public against the serving to them of oleomargarine when they think they were being served butter, than a snap of my finger.

Mr. AIKEN. I think we cannot discount right now any claim that this bill affords any effective protection against the fraudulent serving of imitation butter.

Now for the most important part of my argument against the bill, as I see it, I want to speak of the effect of the proposed legislation on the national economy.

We may assume without question that oleomargarine will make heavy inroads on the butter market if this legislation is passed unamended. That is the purpose of the bill.

We may assume without question that the price of oleomargarine to the consumer will increase. That has been proved in areas where competition from butter has been lacking.

We may assume without question a reduction in the number of dairy cattle in the United States and a cessation of expansion of the dairy industry in those States where it is badly needed.

There are many groups in this country supporting legislation proposed by the oleo interests that would not do so if they had full possession of the facts. These groups are those which generally seek to promote higher living standards and higher incomes among American working people and consumers. Yet what they unwittingly propose is to furnish their tables from the labors of the lowest paid agricultural workers in the United States, if not indeed the 16-cent-a-day labor of the Pacific islands.

Assuming that oleo will be manufactured principally from cottonseed oil, which is the lowest-priced oil on the market today because of the high import tax on coconut oil, I would like to point out the effect on the income of American agricultural labor which this bill, if unamended, will have.

I was informed yesterday by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, United States Department of Agriculture, that the average hourly farm wage rate in three important cotton-producing States is as follows: Mississippi, 40 cents an hour; Arkansas, 47 cents an hour; Georgia, 37 cents an hour.

In contrast to these very low rates, we find the great dairy State of Washington paying its agricultural labor 93 cents an hour; Iowa pays its labor 71 cents an hour, and Minnesota, 68 cents an hour.

But this hourly wage comparison is not the whole story. The worker on the dairy farm has to work every day of the year, including Sundays. Whether he wants to work or not, he has to work every day.

The worker on the cotton farm has a seasonal proposition to deal with.

Therefore, the yearly earnings of the dairy worker are still further out of proportion to those of the cottonfield worker than a comparison of the hourly earnings would indicate.

If the materials used in manufacturing oleo were produced by as highly paid labor as that employed on dairy farms, there would be little difference between the cost of oleo and the cost of butter.

Even with these low wage rates, the cotton grower of the South is in trouble. He is trying to produce and continue to produce cotton on land which has been producing cotton for 150 years.

He is continuing to grow a soil-depleting crop and doing the best he can to make up for that depletion by adding chemical fertilizer.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Does not the Senator from Vermont think that if oleomargarine had the same kind of monopolistic protection which butter has had for 64 years, the producers of oleomargarine might be able to pay high wage rates, too? Of course, the producers of butter have been drawing money from the public by means of this method of artificial, legislative restriction of competition. So, of course, they can pay high wage rates; can they not? If this restriction upon the South is removed, the producers of oleomargarine will be able to pay just as high wage rates as those paid in Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. I fail to see where any monopolistic protection comes in, with two and one-half million producers of milk and several hundred thousand producers of butter, as compared with the seven controlling companies engaged in the oleomargarine industry. I think the Senator from Arkansas is a little out of order in discussing monopolies in connection with the controversy between oleomargarine and butter.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator from Vermont will admit, will he not, that in all our history there has been no other commodity which has had a similar protection from a legitimate competitor?

Mr. AIKEN. I have already pointed out that the oleomargarine monopoly has the protection of a tariff of 22 cents a pound which is applied against imported oleomargarine, as against 7 cents a pound protection given the butter industry.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I should like to point out that the oleomargarine producers did not put that into effect. The butter interests put in that restriction. The oleomargarine producers have not been able to get votes for any such protection, since I have been in the Senate, and long before that. If such a tax was brought about by anyone, it was brought about by the butter producers; it was not brought about by the oleomargarine producers.

Mr. AIKEN. I would hardly say that butter was in a position of enjoying a monopoly. I do not have the figures before me; but the sales of oleomargarine in the United States are rapidly approaching the sales of butter. That does not indicate a monopoly in any sense of the word.

Now the Senator from Arkansas has made it fairly plain that it is the ambition of the oleomargarine interests to take over the rest of the butter market. It is my purpose to point out how disastrous that would be to the general economy of the country.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If the Senator's argument is correct, why does he not propose legislation to prohibit the raising of row crops? Then all of us would be very well off, indeed, no doubt. If there is any logic at all in his argument, we should outlaw the production of soybeans, and especially the production of corn and cotton, because they deplete the soil.

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator from Arkansas is saying that if this bill is passed, the farm-labor wage rate in the South will be raised to a level comparable with that in the North. I wonder whether the Senator from Arkansas would be willing to join me in proposing a minimum farm wage for farm labor of, let us say, 75 cents an hour.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. No; I much prefer that these matters result from a natural economic condition, rather than to be brought about by planning done in Washington.

The Senator from Vermont said a few moments ago that the people do not know anything about this question. That remark by the Senator from Vermont leaves the impression that here in the United States only the Senate possesses wisdom. However, the fact is that since 1901, 16 States have eliminated the prohibition against yellow margarine. Within the last 2 months, Ohio, by a vote of its people, removed the restriction on yellow margarine. The people themselves have spoken. Now 32 States, a majority of the States of the Union, do not have these restrictions. So the idea that the only knowledge of this matter reposes here in the Senate seems to me to be completely contrary to the facts.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas is making a good argument in favor of the enactment of anti-poll-tax legislation, anyway.

But I wish to point out that it is not only agricultural labor which is much cheaper in the South; it is also industrial labor. The average factory worker in Arkansas is paid 90 cents an hour, as compared with $1.16 an hour which is paid to the average factory worker in Michigan.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I am perfectly willing to agree to that, for the South has for so long been exploited by the Yankees that it is very difficult for us to get the means with which to live. There is no question about that. That is what has been done by freight-rate policies and other policies. This question is just another example of the policies which have been imposed upon the South for many years. I am perfectly willing to admit that. We are struggling to have a free, equal access to the markets of this country. That is all we want.

Mr. AIKEN. No; the Senator from Arkansas is trying to take over the butter market.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wish to say that I think the South is exploited in the matter of freight rates. But one of the very startling features of that problem is that we do not find much protest coming from the southern Representatives and Senators about the freight rates; and when Governor Arnall some years ago started a fight before the Interstate Commerce Commission to get the discriminatory freight rates reduced, nearly all the southern businessmen and southern Representatives in Congress lined up with the railroads, and not in favor of the reduction of freight rates.

When the southern Representatives in Congress really wish to join in the fight for a reduction of the freight rates, we will join them in that fight. But they will not get very far unless they themselves join in that fight.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. AIKEN. Yes, if the Senator from Arkansas does not go too far away from the pending question.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I shall not.

I wish to state that long before the junior Senator from Illinois came to the Senate, this battle went on for a long time. The Governor of my State and its representatives in the House of Representatives and in the Senate did everything they could. However, after they obtained a ruling from the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Governor of the great State of New York resorted to the courts. In such matters our opponents have a way, outside of the Senate, of stalling and putting off, so as to prevent action. They do that outside of the Senate.

The same tactics have been followed in the Senate with regard to margarine. We never have been able to get a vote here on the question of removing the taxes on margarine or on removing the other discriminations which have been practiced against us, although various Senators have interested themselves in those matters, and although great efforts have been made to obtain such votes.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, let me say for the benefit of the junior Senator from Illinois, who has just recently entered the Chamber, that the statement I made which precipitated this most recent discussion was that if the materials used in manufacturing oleomargarine were produced by as highly paid labor as that which is employed on the dairy farms and in the dairy industry, there would be little difference between the price of oleomargarine and the price of butter. But even with such low wage rates, the cotton growers are in trouble. They are trying to produce and to continue to produce cotton on land which has been producing cotton for 150 years. They are continuing to grow a soil-depleting crop, and are doing the best they can to make up for that depletion by adding chemical fertilizer.

These old cotton States of the South are just now getting under way toward conversion to other more profitable types of agricultural production. The one greatest opportunity which lies before them is that of converting to an animal industry, and particularly to a dairy industry.

Under the false pretense of protecting their income, this bill is striking a blow at the greatest hope which would otherwise lie before them.

If we undertake to increase the cottonseed production to meet the demands for unrestricted invasion of oleo into the butter market, we must remember that while we are increasing the production of cottonseed, we are also increasing the production of cotton fiber, which is already in such tremendous surplus that the cotton market would collapse today were it not for payments and loans from the Federal Treasury.

Why do we undertake to encourage the continuance of uneconomic conditions for the benefit of a handful of oleo manufacturers?

Why do we not take a long-range view of the situation, and protect the income of American agricultural workers, protect the market for American industrial goods, protect the wage level of American workers, and protect the economy of the Nation, by amending this bill so that it will be impossible for the oleo interests to partially destroy the branch of our American economy upon which the greatest number of our people depend.

Mr. McCARTHY obtained the floor.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, to permit me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk (Emery L. Frazier) called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hendrickson	O'Mahoney
Anderson	Hickenlooper	Russell
Butler	Holland	Saltonstall
Connally	Hunt	Schoeppel
Cordon	Johnson, Tex.	Smith, N. J.
Donnell	Johnston, S. C.	Sparkman
Dworshak	Kerr	Stennis
Eastland	Knowland	Taft
Ellender	Lehman	Taylor
Ferguson	McCarran	Thomas, Okla.
Fulbright	McCarthy	Thomas, Utah
George	McKellar	Thye
Gillette	McMahon	Vandenberg
Green	Maybank	Wherry
Gurney	Neely	Wiley
Hayden	O'Conor

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is not present. The clerk will call the names of the absent Senators.

The legislative clerk (Edward E. Mansur, Jr.) proceeded to call the names of the absent Senators.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I withdraw my suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUNT in the chair). The Chair rules that the suggestion of the absence of a quorum cannot be withdrawn.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I abide by the decision of the Chair, Mr. President.

Mr. WILEY. I insist, Mr. President, that the clerk continue to call the roll.

The Chief Clerk resumed calling the names of the absent Senators.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to withdraw my suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of a quorum, the Senate cannot give unanimous consent.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded calling the names of absent Senators, and Mr. BENTON, Mr. BREWSTER, Mr. BRICKER, Mr. BYRD, Mr. CHAPMAN, Mr. DARBY, Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr. DOWNEY, Mr. ECTON, Mr. FREAR, Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. HILL, Mr. HOEY, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. IVES, Mr. JENNER, Mr. KEFAUVER, Mr. KEM, Mr. LANGER, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. LONG, Mr. LUCAS, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. MALONE, Mr. MARTIN, Mr. McCLELLAN, Mr. McFARLAND, Mr. MORSE, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. MYERS, Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. TOBEY, Mr. WATKINS, Mr. WILLIAMS, and Mr. YOUNG answered to their names when called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to H. R. 2023 and ask that it be allowed to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD. I wish to have it stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 4, between lines 10 and 11, insert the following new section:

SEC. 4. (a) Section 15 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended, is amended by inserting "(1)" after the letter "(a)" in subsection (a) thereof, and by adding at the end of such subsection the following new paragraph:

"(2) In the case of oleomargarine or margarine an advertisement shall be deemed misleading in a material respect if in such advertisement representations are made or suggested by statement, word, grade designation, design, device, symbol, sound, or any combination thereof, that such oleomargarine or margarine is a dairy product."

(b) Such section 15 is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(f) The term 'oleomargarine or margarine' includes—

"(1) All substances, mixtures, and compounds known as oleomargarine, margarine, oleo, or butterine;

"(2) All substances, mixtures, and compounds which have a consistence similar to that of butter and which contain any edible oils or fats other than milk fat if (A) made in imitation or semblance of butter, or purporting to be butter or a butter substitute, or (B) commonly used, or intended for common use, in place of or as a substitute for butter, or (C) churned, emulsified, or mixed in cream, milk, skim milk, buttermilk, water, or other liquid and containing moisture in excess of 1 percent and commonly used, or suitable for common use, as a substitute for butter."

On page 4, line 11, strike out "Sec. 4" and insert "Sec. 5."

On page 4, line 23, strike out "Sec. 5" and insert "Sec. 6."

On page 5, line 3, strike out "Sec. 6" and insert "Sec. 7."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would like to have the Senator state whether he wishes to have the amendment considered the pending question.

Mr. McCARTHY. I understand there is a very good possibility that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], who is in charge of the pending bill, may accept the amendment. I understand also that my cosponsors of the Wiley amendment may possibly accept it as an amendment to the Wiley substitute. For the time being I believe I shall have to request that it be the pending question, although I am not at all concerned about whether it is the pending question or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. McCARTHY].

Mr. McCARTHY. While this is not technically presented as an amendment to the Wiley substitute, I should like to have it so considered and inserted in the proper place in the Wiley substitute, so that it will be offered both as an amendment to the Wiley substitute and to the Fulbright bill.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. WILEY. I have not seen the particular amendment which has been suggested as an amendment to the substitute amendment, but I did hear it read, and it seemed to me that it had merit. So far as I am personally concerned, while I am only one of the 25 or 26 sponsors of the proposed substitute, I am inclined to accept the amendment to the substitute, if that would be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONG in the chair). The senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] can modify his proposed substitute by accepting the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Wisconsin, if he so desires.

Mr. WILEY. I do so desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed substitute is so modified.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I am still offering it as an amendment to the original Fulbright bill, and I ask to have it printed and to lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as offered to the original bill.

Mr. McCARTHY. Simply stated, Mr. President, the amendment is for the purpose of making illegal the unfair and dishonest advertising of oleomargarine. I have before me some unusual examples of the attempts of the oleomargarine interests to try to pass their product off as butter. I believe that is unfair, not only to the dairy farmer, but also to the consumer. The only individuals who can gain by this type of dishonest advertising are the oleomargarine interests.

In order to show what I am discussing, I have before me, for example, a paper dated December 1, 1949, with big headlines, "Dairy products for holiday goodies," showing a bottle of milk, beside it a piece of cheese, and a pound of butter. Underneath appears "Pak Delrich, lb. pkg. 27 cents." It is oleomargarine. That is in a New York newspaper.

I have before me a newspaper from Memphis, the Memphis Press-Scimitar, dated February 24, 1949, advertising Durkee's oleomargarine, beside what looks like a pound of butter. There is pictured a dairy farm. This is advertised as "country fresh." Obviously the purpose of it is to create the impression that this is a dairy product.

I have before me, Mr. President, a newspaper from San Francisco, the San Francisco Call-Bulletin, advertising Wilson's oleomargarine as "churned fresh daily." As we know, "churning" means separating the butterfat from the milk. That is the common conception of it. There are of course other conceptions of churning, but in the public mind "churning" means taking the cream and removing the butter. They advertise this as "churned fresh daily," and they mention the word "milk" in it also.

I have before me also a newspaper from White Plains, N. Y., the Reporter Dispatch, dated December 1, 1949, in which again appears a very good drawing of dairy products. Underneath are the words "Dairy products, margarine, Numaid, 2 pounds 45 cents," under the heading of "Dairy products."

Mr. President, I have before me also the Cleveland Press, dated Thursday, December 15, 1949, advertising Durkee's products. I might say that this outfit, Durkee's, which is a division of the Glidden Corp., seems to be one of the principal offenders. They have embarked upon a deliberate campaign to try to palm off their oleomargarine as butter.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Is that the same company which makes paint?

Mr. McCARTHY. That is the same company which makes paint.

Mr. AIKEN. Out of the same material? [Laughter.]

Mr. McCARTHY. Perhaps out of the same material. If the Senator from Arkansas were in the Chamber, I should like to ask him a question about that.

As Senators know, since 1943 the Department of Agriculture has administered and promoted a consumer-grading program, insofar as butter is concerned. The first grade is AA, which is the highest grade of butter. The next grade is A, and then are B and C. There is no such grading of oleomargarine.

I find in this newspaper, the Cleveland Press, a large advertisement "Durkee's Oleomargarine." Then there is a huge arrow pointing from a package that resembles a package of butter to a large yellow circle entitled "Grade AA Fortified." Also "Look for this Quality Seal."

When they advertise this they know that people do look for quality seal, AA, in butter, and they know that it means something in butter. They know, for example, that the manufacturer who has a grade-A butter cannot list it as grade AA. But Durkee and the Glidden Corp. can put grade AA on their product because it is not regulated. That, however, will be controlled, if my amendment is adopted.

I have before me also, Mr. President, a New York newspaper dated Thursday, November 17, 1949. It is the Reporter Dispatch of White Plains. Again we find the same type of deliberately dishonest advertising. There appear drawings of cheese and butter, very excellent and very appetizing in appearance, and a huge banner saying "Remember, Dairy Products Are Vital to Good Health." Underneath that it says "Nucoa, pound package 27 cents."

I have before me also, Mr. President, but unfortunately it cannot be reproduced in the RECORD, the Durkee package in which they pack the oleomargarine, very deliberately made to appear exactly as a butter package, even down to the grade AA, which only butter manufacturers should be entitled to use under the rules and regulations of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. President, there is another amendment which I intend to offer, but which I have not yet prepared, which would go hand in hand with the amendment which I have submitted. That amendment will provide that all oleomargarine must be labeled in letters at least one-half inch high "This is not a dairy product."

Mr. President, I believe both amendments, if adopted, will do a great deal for the consumer, in protecting him against this type of dishonest, misleading advertising, and also, of course, will protect the dairy farmers from the dishonest competition which they are now encountering.

I may say that I am sure the dairy farmers of my State—and Wisconsin has the greatest production of dairy products of any State in the Union—are not worried about any honest competition from any other product. I am sure that the dairy farmers of my State feel that if the housewife would prefer to buy oleomargarine, she should be able to buy it, but she ought to know what she is buying when she does so.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to do so.

Mr. WILEY. I presume this particular amendment has been carefully studied, to make sure there is no African in the woodpile. The whole purpose of the amendment is clearly to indicate that it would be illegal for the oleo interests to advertise their products as dairy products. That is the sum and substance of the amendment, is it not?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes; the purpose of the amendment is to prevent any form of advertisement which gives the impression, directly or by inference, that the consumer is buying butter.

Mr. WILEY. In other words, the amendment would place no limitation upon the legitimate advertising of oleomargarine or margarine?

Mr. McCARTHY. None whatsoever. I might say that there should not be. If the oleo interests can sell their product on its merits I do not think we should in any way try to resist them. But I do think we should make sure that they advertise it solely as what it is.

Mr. WILEY. I thank my colleague. Mr. President, if my colleague has completed his statement, I shall suggest the absence of a quorum. Before I do so I will say that I had expected that a Senator on the other side of the aisle and one on our side of the aisle would speak, in addition to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], who has spoken, and that the afternoon would thus be consumed in discussing the unfinished business. The Senator from the Democratic side who was to speak, however, has been taken ill.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, if the Senator wants time consumed, I will say I have an amendment I can offer, the purpose of which is to repeal the poll tax. I am sure discussion of it would consume some time. I shall be glad to submit it.

Mr. WILEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum. I hope my colleague will remain in the Senate Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. LONG in the chair]. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to withdraw my suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I wish to propound this inquiry: What question is now pending before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on agreeing to the McCarthy amendment which has been proposed to the original bill, on page 4, after line 10.

A moment ago the absence of a quorum was suggested.

Mr. GEORGE. Has that amendment already been offered to the Wiley substitute?

Mr. WILEY. That is correct, and it has been accepted, and is now a part of the Wiley substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has requested unanimous consent to withdraw his suggestion of the absence of a quorum. Is there objection? The Chair hearing none, it is so ordered.

The question now is on agreeing to the McCarthy amendment proposed to the original bill, on page 4, after line 10.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I offer and send to the desk two amendments to the pending oleomargarine bill. I ask that they be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. LANGER. The first amendment, Repeal of War-tax Rates of Certain Miscellaneous Taxes, would repeal the war-tax rates of the following taxes: Admissions; use or lease of boxes or seats; sales of tickets outside box office; cabarets, roof gardens, and so forth; dues or membership fees; initiation fees; jewelry; furs; toilet preparations; distilled spirits; imported perfumes containing distilled spirits; still wines; sparkling wines; liqueurs and cordials; fermented malt liquors; billiard and pool tables and bowling alleys; electric-light bulbs and tubes; telephone, long-distance; domestic telegraph, cable, or radio dispatches; leased wires, and so forth; wire and equipment service; local telephone service; transportation of persons; seats, berths, and so forth; and luggage, purses, and so forth.

The second amendment, Repeal of Certain Excise Taxes, would repeal all of the excise taxes on the articles and services listed in the following subsection by subsection analysis:

Subsection (a) removes all excise taxes from admissions and dues.

Subsection (b) removes the so-called retailers' excise taxes which includes taxes on jewelry, furs, and toilet preparations.

Subsection (c) removes manufacturers' excise taxes which includes taxes on tires and inner tubes; toilet preparations; automobiles and parts; radios, phonographs, and musical instruments; mechanical refrigerators and air-conditioning units; sporting goods; luggage; electric, gas, and oil appliances; photographic apparatus; electric signs; business and store machines; rubber articles; washing machines; optical equipment; electric-light bulbs and tubes; firearms, shells, and cartridges; matches; electrical energy for domestic and commercial consumption; gasoline; and lubricating oils.

Subsection (d) removes the excise taxes on transportation and communication which includes taxes on transportation of oil by pipe line; telegraph, telephone, radio, and cable facilities; transportation of persons; and transportation of property.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. Does it include any suggested legislation in relation to income taxes?

Mr. LANGER. No.

ORDER FOR RECESS TO MONDAY

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate finishes its business of today it take a recess until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPARKMAN in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to House bill 2023, and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment for the information of the Senate. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that he has already pending one amendment to this bill, which the Senate has not yet acted upon.

Mr. McCARTHY. I understand that, Mr. President, but I have discussed this with the cosponsors of the substitute bill, and I believe it will be accepted, as will also, I believe, the original amendment. I understand the sponsor of the Fulbright measure will consider this and let us know at some later time whether or not he will accept both of my amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator propose to withdraw the earlier amendment?

Mr. McCARTHY. The earlier amendment has been accepted by the——

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GEORGE. Is there not already pending an amendment to the original bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. That is what the Chair has just called to the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I make the point of order that another amendment to the original bill is not now in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I understand that, but there is nothing which prevents my explaining to the Senate the purpose of this amendment and having it lie on the table. I ask that the amendment be stated and that it lie upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be in order. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On the first page, between lines 10 and 11, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 3. Section 403 of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act is amended by adding thereto a new paragraph as follows:

"(l) If it is oleomargarine or margarine unless there shall appear on the label thereof in letters not less than one-half inch in height the words 'This is not a dairy product.'"

On the first page, line 11, strike out "SEC. 3" and insert "SEC. 4."

On page 4, line 23, strike out "SEC. 5" and insert "SEC. 6."

On page 5, line 3, strike out "SEC. 6" and insert "SEC. 7."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I discussed this amendment in some detail when I discussed my original amendment, which was designed to prevent fraudulent, dishonest advertising. I believe the amendment is self-explanatory and needs no discussion. I understand that my cosponsors of the Wiley-Gillette substitute will accept this amendment and also the pending amendment. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will also accept as a part of his original bill both my first amendment and the amendment that is lying on the table, and I certainly should be happy to hear from him on that point later in the afternoon.

Mr. GEORGE. I shall have to insist that one amendment be offered at a time. If the Senator wishes to withdraw his amendment to the pending bill, he may offer any other amendment to it that he wishes.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think the Senator from Georgia misunderstands what I have done. I offered an amendment to the pending bill. I have sent to the desk a second amendment, to have it printed and lie on the table until such time as I may, under the rules of the Senate, call it up.

Mr. GEORGE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. McCARTHY. I have not attempted to call up my second amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not want to have the issue confused by several amendments, all pending at one time. I did not understand the Senator. If that is the case, I beg his pardon.

Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether he asks that the first amendment offered, the amendment to the pending bill, not to the substitute but to the pending bill, be printed?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, I did.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. McCARTHY].

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, as I stated before, there were several Senators who were going to speak. We have had a number of quorum calls today, and we have never had a bona fide quorum. The reasons are very evident. I think most Senators figured there would be no vote, there would be no real action taken on the bill or on any of the amendments. I personally had planned to speak Monday. The three Senators who I know are going to speak have requested that the matter go over so they can speak Monday. That would mean, I think, that as far as the substitute amendment is concerned, unless we were to take up amendments to the amendment, we would be practically through speaking on the substitute amendment, Monday or Tuesday. However, today, two amendments have been suggested, and I heard some talk a few minutes ago about a poll-tax amendment; so I have no assurance how far the discussion may go. But in view of the fact that there has not been a bona fide quorum present, I am going to ask the majority leader to agree to a motion at this time to adjourn or recess in accordance with his previous statement to the Senate.

Mr. LUCAS. It is now a quarter of three. I had hoped we might run along until approximately 5 o'clock before we adjourned or recessed today. I am sure a number of promargarine Senators and prodairy Senators have good speeches in their systems which are bound to come out sooner or later.

Mr. WILEY. Is that true of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I did not yield to the Senator for that question.

Mr. WILEY. It is only a suggestion.

Mr. LUCAS. I dislike very much to have the Senate adjourn in the middle of the afternoon, although I must admit we have gone along pretty well since we convened last Tuesday. Does the Senator from Wisconsin not have someone in the dairy camp who could entertain the Senate for another hour or so? The only thing I am trying to do is to move the Senate along with all possible expedition. I know my distinguished friend from Wisconsin is a candidate for reelection this year, I know he wants to get back to the hustings as soon as he can, and I should think it would be in his interest to move all legislation along as speedily as possible. He and I both understand what it is to go over a large State in a campaign, and I was trying really to help the Senator from Wisconsin by my effort to expedite this legislation and all other legislation.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I am glad to yield to my distinguished colleague from the North.

Mr. WILEY. I do not think there is any question of entertainment in this case, as suggested by the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. I shall change the word.

Mr. WILEY. It is a pretty serious matter, as I believe, to a large segment of the country, and I feel that in view of the bill of goods which has been sold through the newspapers, through the radio, and through other channels, the whole issue has become rather befogged. I feel it is important that we have a quorum in the Senate when we discuss a measure which is, I think, calculated to affect vitally the economic and political structure of the country. That is the only reason for my suggestion.

I trust that Senators who are away from Washington traveling, and those who have gone home over the week-end, will be here Monday. I myself, am very serious, in my own conviction. So far as the hustings are concerned, I am sure all of us will do the best we can to look after them. If the Senator should insist on the Senate proceeding, I should raise the question of there being no quorum; we would find no quorum present, and we would then go over until Saturday, unless the order entered a while ago applies. I do not want to delay the matter; I want to facilitate it. I have never been accused of engaging in filibustering tactics. I think, however, that if we adjourn or recess now, and Senators are on notice that they are supposed to be here Monday to speak, we shall really accelerate action on this whole measure. That is the way I feel.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Wisconsin, I wish to assure him that I was not being facetious when I used the word "entertain." If the Senator objects to that word, I shall be glad to apply a different word, because I agree with him that this is a very serious question for many different interests throughout the United States of America. What I do not quite understand is the fact that the Senator states that certain Senators are out of the city and will not be present until next Monday. I had thought that all Senators would be remaining in or around Washington pretty closely, in view of the fact that the Senate returned to the Capitol only last Tuesday. I am certain that we have today as large a group present as any Senator could reasonably expect to find to talk to on either the margarine or the butter question. If the Senator wants a recess until Monday, I shall not insist to the contrary, although I think it is probably wrong to take a recess at this time.

Mr. WILEY. Perhaps there are other Senators present who would like to speak on some other subjects that would be of interest or would be entertaining to the galleries and the Members who are present. I am sure that any one of us, including the majority leader, can provide the entertainment or wisdom that may be necessary. On the other hand, the issue before the Senate is the oleomargarine bill, and I feel that we shall accelerate action on it if we do as I have suggested.

I am perfectly willing to go on, if the majority leader insists on that course. A matter of a couple of hours should not trouble any Senator who has been in the Senate a few years.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, if I agree with my good friend from Wisconsin that we take a recess until Monday, could I obtain from him any unanimous-consent agreement with respect to when we might finally vote on the oleomargarine bill?

Mr. WILEY. If I were in a position in which I could express the sentiments of all those who joined in the substitute amendment, I should be glad to say "yes" to that question, but I will say to the Senator that one of my objectives is to try to get a meeting tomorrow of the Senators who oppose the pending bill, and to see if we cannot come to some definite understanding with relation to procedure, particularly in relation to suggested amendments. There are approximately 26 names attached to the substitute amendment, and I have had no opportunity to speak with any of those Senators since the first of January. I am in no position to enter into any agreement.

RECESS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I desire to accommodate the Senator from Wisconsin and other Senators who are interested in the cause, and, in view of the very persuasive plea which my friend from Wisconsin makes regarding taking a recess, and with the full realization that he has much to do between now and Monday in order to get together the group of Senators whom he has mentioned, for the purpose of ascertaining how long it will take to debate the bill, I now move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, January 9, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 6 (legislative day of January 4), 1950:

UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS

Everett W. Hepp, of Alaska, to be United States attorney for division No. 4, district of Alaska, vice Harry O. Arend, resigned.

Irving H. Saypol, of New York, to be United States attorney for the southern district of New York, vice John F. X. McGohey, elevated.

UNITED STATES MARSHAL

Henry Robert Bell, of Tennessee, to be United States marshal for the eastern district of Tennessee. He is now serving in this office under an appointment which expired July 2, 1949.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JANUARY 6, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Frank B. Burress, pastor, Fountain Memorial Baptist Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, Thou who hast been our dwelling place in all generations, we call upon Thee because Thou hast promised to answer our petitions. We are grateful that Thou hast not answered as we have always prayed, because Thine infinite judgment knew that we had asked amiss. Thy will be done in our lives today. Teach us how to pray.

Bless the Members of this assembly, in their deliberations today, with wisdom from on high for Thou has said, "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God."

For the great host of people who are employed by our Government in its various branches here in the homeland, and those who represent us in countries afar, on the islands and at sea, we ask Thy divine favor and wisdom today. May the Speaker of the House be especially blessed with good health and happiness on this his birthday, and for many years to come. We ask these petitions in the name of our Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, January 4, 1950, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDaniel, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had adopted the following resolutions:

Senate Resolution 199

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. GEORGE J. BATES, late a Representative from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now take a recess until 12 o'clock tomorrow.

Senate Resolution 200

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. MARTIN GORSKI, late a Representative from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now take a recess until 12 o'clock tomorrow.

The message also announced that the Vice President has appointed Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, and Mr. LANGER members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of August 5, 1939, entitled "An act to provide for the disposition of certain records of the United States Government," for the disposition of executive papers referred to in the report of the Archivist of the United States numbered 50–12.

BIRTHDAY GREETINGS, MR. SPEAKER

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, without excluding other human activities, one of the activities of life that brings forth the greatness of a man is elective public service. Each and every one of us is aware of the many factors which enter into our own life and which tend to influence us in the rendering of our service to our people and our country and to develop the greatness that lies within us. One of those men who have developed the greatness and nobility of character both as individuals and as public officials was born some few years ago in Tennessee. When he was a child his parents went to Texas, and he went with them; and Texas, for all practical purposes, is his native State. His people recognized his greatness by electing him to the legislature of that great State, and his colleagues in the legislature in those years recognized his greatness of character and leadership by electing him speaker.

His people later recognized his outstanding qualities and elected him to Congress. He has been here many years. He has always commanded the respect of every person who has ever served with him and he commands the respect of all of his colleagues who serve with him now.

His public service has been outstanding, as we all know. He is loyal to his friends. He is patient, he is tolerant, he has consistently adhered to principle. He is a man of complete intellectual honesty and of the highest integrity. He is a man of simple taste, close to the soil and close to the people, a true representative of democratic institutions of government, a keen appraiser of human qualities. He possesses great faith in people and believes good in most people excels, by far, the bad.

I refer to one whose birthday is today, our beloved and distinguished Speaker, and may God bless him for many, many future birthdays to come, the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, of Texas. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARENDS].

Mr. ARENDS. Like my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], and all Members of this House on both sides of the aisle, I join in wishing the present occupant of the chair, Speaker RAYBURN, all good luck and good wishes for health and happiness in the years that lie ahead.

During the 15 years I have been a Member of this body I have learned, just as you have, to love the Speaker and to respect him for the fine American citizen he is and for the outstanding contribution he is making to government, has made in the past, and will, we hope, continue to make in the future.

The Speaker as I see him grows no taller, the Speaker does not get any fatter, as I have noticed in the past 15 years, and, may I say, his hair is as usual. He keeps young, he looks ahead and not backward. So those of us who are here today and who have this opportunity wish him Godspeed and all the good things in life. As a Republican, may I say there is one little item I wish he might consider and do for us of the minority, and that is to relinquish the chair to our side of the aisle at least once in a while. However, in the spirit of comradeship and with real personal warmth we wish him all the better things in life to which he so richly deserves.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Texas delegation and those great folks back home in Bonham and those fine counties the Speaker has so ably represented for a good many years, may I say that the best of everything is not good enough for our Speaker.

I know of no man in this House or in any other body who has stood closer to his people back home than has our Speaker. We all love him and we all admire him. He is one of us and we all hope and pray that he may live to be 110. Of course, we all want to be there with him on that day.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be privileged to join with others in paying tribute to a great man who has exercised and is now exercising a stabilizing influence in these turbulent times through which the country is passing. The friendship which the occupant of the chair gives those in whom he has confidence is the kind of solder that holds human society together. The solidity of his character, the rightness of his perspective, the soundness of his judgment, his ability to hold the scales with equal justice as between contending forces, make him a very extraordinary man. I have tested every piece of timber used in the structure of this great American, and I know every piece is sound and unyielding to the corroding influences of selfishness and greed.

It is my prayer that he shall have the continued guidance of the Good Master.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is my honor and privilege to join my distinguished colleagues congratulating my friend SAM RAYBURN on attaining his sixty-eighth birth date. It has also been my honor and privilege to serve in the same State delegation with the Speaker for nearly 22 years. It happens that my district adjoins his in Texas. Long before I came here I knew of the great record made by my neighbor from Bonham in the House since he entered this Chamber as a Member on March 4, 1913.

When I came to the House as a new Member in 1929, SAM RAYBURN gave me advice I have treasured ever since. He said when a man entered Congress he had to serve two constituencies. The first being his constituents in his district and the second the constituents in the House. By the latter he meant that one had to get along with his colleagues in order to be effective in the Chamber and for his constituency at home. The second point was that accomplishments are achieved through party loyalty. That is, that by adhering to party principles, insofar as conscience and pledges permit, accomplishments are achieved.

We all know the Speaker's spirit of fair play, his love of service, his great ability to lead, his friendliness, loyalty, and personality; his alertness, strength of character, tolerance, and modesty combine to make him the great character of American legislative history for which he is renowned.

My personal wish is that for years to come that the Speaker celebrates his birthday anniversary in the chair he now occupies.

I know I express the feelings of untold millions of Texans and people from other States when I wish our beloved Speaker great happiness in public service and personal life on this day and all the days to come.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the privilege of expressing my affection and regard and respect for a friend of many years and in joining with my colleagues in this richly deserved tribute to our distinguished Speaker.

One of the chief rewards of membership in this body is the friendships which we enjoy, even though our highly intelligent constituents back home are sometimes puzzled to find that party lines and loyalties do not interfere in any degree with our personal friendships.

I take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to thank you for your friendship, which has been a guiding star to me for 25 years; for your helpful words of advice and counsel; and for the splendid example you have set me and all of us in your fine Americanism. I pray God that you may have many years of blessedness and happiness. While I do not join with wild enthusiasm in the hope expressed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], that you will occupy your present position indefinitely, whether you are on the throne or down among us common people, I am going to love you with all my heart and thank God for you every day.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LARCADE].

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker—

Speakers may come, and Speakers may go,
But there's one thing of which I am sure:
None have been better nor more beloved
Than the one who found his place in our hearts,
And who will always have his place in the sun;
Of course, I do not have to say that I mean SAM RAYBURN.

He rides herd here like he does in Texas,
And as he goes down the trail and passes one who vexes,
Playfully he clips him on the hip with his whip,
And no one dares give him any lip.

Speaking for 435 Members in fantasia,
We all hope to be back with him next January;
But come what may, this is his day,
And we today, and always, will Wish SAM RAYBURN a happy birthday.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. REDDEN].

Mr. REDDEN. Mr. Speaker, I heartily concur in all that has been said about the fine statesman who is our Speaker. I rise principally to keep the record straight. North Carolina does not claim all the great men who have occupied the chair of this House, but since we do claim that many great men emanate from that State, I should like to refresh the memory of some of those here today to say that Tennessee was formed from North Carolina and consequently the Speaker emanated from that great State.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON].

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, Speaker RAYBURN is a man concerning whom the simple truth is the highest encomium, a man who enjoys the esteem, the friendship, the confidence, and the affectionate regard of every Member of this House, a great statesman, a great Speaker, a great American, a truly great man.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, as the senior Member from the State of New York I, too, offer my felicitations to our worthy and honored Speaker. I am sure what I say is an expression of all the members of the New York delegation.

I have served with the Speaker for a very long period of time. I have served with him for almost 28 years. During that period I have come to have an affectionate regard for him and an appreciation of his sturdiness and worthwhileness as a Member of this House.

May divine providence ever endow him with good health and happiness. During the long time that I have served with him I have had occasion to watch him—his hand has never faltered, particularly in handling the gavel. Ever alert, ever prudent, ever humane, he has given us indeed a wise and sagacious leadership. He is a statesman of high caliber. He is indeed a tower of strength in our legislative branch.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, today is the birthday of our distinguished and beloved Speaker, SAM RAYBURN. He has been Speaker longer than anyone else who ever held the position. It is our hope that he will continue as our Speaker for many, many more years, so that no one will ever equal his years of service in this position. We know that the House never has been and never will be presided over by a more capable, understanding, or fair-minded person than SAM RAYBURN.

Again, happy birthday to our Speaker.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join with so many others in this House today in wishing you a happy birthday. Few men in life have been accorded the honor and have had the privilege of rendering public service to the extent that you have. To state that your success has been phenomenal is to state something that everybody in the country knows.

But we who have associated with you in this House for many years have come to know you better and more intimately than most other Americans, and we have learned to appreciate the fine qualities of statesmanship and leadership which you possess. Qualities which have carried you to the pinnacle of fame and which have made for you an enduring place in history. You have held the Speakership in this august body during one of the most trying times in American history. We all wish for you continued health, happiness, and success, and may God guide you as you continue to fill such a high place in the destinies of this Nation.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I would not be true to my inner feelings if I did not join with the others in congratulating you, our distinguished Speaker, on this your natal day.

I came to Congress many years ago and even then SAM RAYBURN was a common name in Congress. He was respected, admired, and loved by all who served with him. I soon became acquainted with him and joined the general procession of admirers and friends.

I am a Republican from the Canadian border and SAM RAYBURN is a Democrat from the Mexican border. There is no Mason and Dixon's line so far as we are concerned. We do not always agree, but when I cannot agree with the Speaker I sometimes begin to doubt as to the correctness of my position. The Speaker is a tolerant man. He does not assume to be a Solomon in wisdom, and he does and can disagree without being disagreeable. In all my life I have never come in contact with a man whom I thought tried harder to be fair and just in his dealings with his fellow man and in wielding the great power that is his as Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. Speaker, regardless of party affiliations, we like you and wish you well down through the years that are to come.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr Speaker, I just wish to add a few words to the many eulogies you are receiving, this day, from your colleagues in the House, in observance of your birthday. I sincerely believe that you truly desire to see an actual era of peace on earth and good will toward men, and that you will continue to work, to the best of your ability, to help bring it about. Your influence in this respect is great.

I think that you are inherently just, fair, and tolerant. You possess great intelligence and bigness of heart, as well. You are, in my judgment, a good man as well as a great one. I think it is very probable that you will live in history as the greatest Speaker the United States House of Representatives has had. You most certainly are among the greatest.

It is an inspiration to watch, almost daily, your staying on the job and patiently working out intricate and knotty problems in behalf of better government and in high service to our great Nation. May God bless you and keep you in robust health for many years to come.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. It has been an inspiration, certainly strengthening to one's faith in our American democracy, to be here today and listen to the tributes which have come from both sides of the aisle to the stature and the character of the distinguished gentleman from Texas who is our beloved and respected Speaker. My colleagues, both Democratic and Republican, who have served with him in this Chamber for years running into the decades, have spoken of him in the language of real affection and have testified to his tolerance and his fairness under all circumstances and under the stress of all demands upon his understanding and his patience.

I can speak, and with deference to those in much seniority to whom happy fortune has given the richness of long association with our Speaker, merely as one who came to serve with and under him but 1 year ago. I know that I speak the sentiment of all my colleagues of the "class of 1949" when I say that no one in all the world could have made us feel more at home than did Speaker SAM RAYBURN, and on this glad anniversay of his birth we would wish him to know how our hearts are overfilled with appreciation of all that he has done, in his graciousness, his kindliness, and his human understanding to help us, the newcomers, fit into this pattern of democracy in function which in its highest expression is presented by the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, the observance of Speaker SAM RAYBURN'S birthday is an event participated in by Members of Congress, individually and collectively. In this, we are joined by his people in Texas and by his countless friends and admirers all over this land of ours. We hear well-deserved tributes to his leadership, his statesmanlike conduct, his broad vision, and many other traits of high character.

As I listen to all of these appropriate evidences of the high regard of his fellow men, my mind keeps going back to the days when I first came to Congress as a very young man and one wholly unschooled in the affairs of Washington. The Speaker, even in those days, was recognized as a leader. Certainly, he was one to whom a young man would instinctively turn for advice. The habit of going to him with my problems has continued through the years even during the time when I was not a Member of this body. He has patiently listened in every instance and has invariably given me thoughtful counsel, oftentimes guiding my steps along wise paths where they might not otherwise have gone.

I have watched this generous characteristic of his in the case of a great many other young Members of Congress. I believe that what has happened to me has happened to hundreds of others, and I have no doubt that many a public career has gone on to great heights because of the guidance, in early stages, of Speaker RAYBURN, who is always anxious to push younger Members to the front, to give them responsibilities, and to use their abilities to the fullest possible extent.

He has a God-given knack of imparting knowledge, and he has a completely unselfish desire to share his own great store with those of us who seek it.

These are the traits which remain uppermost in my mind when I think of our beloved Speaker. These are the traits which, I believe, make him one of the great men of our day and of the Nation.

Mr. THORNBERRY. Mr. Speaker, may I as the newest Member of the delegation from Texas add my word of congratulations and best wishes to Speaker RAYBURN on this, his birthday.

During the short time I have been here, it has meant much to me to have known Mr. RAYBURN and to have had the benefit of his generous friendship, his kindly and considerate advice, and his great and inspiring leadership.

In the district which I am privileged to represent we honor SAM RAYBURN as a noble Texan and a great American. I am sure the people of the Tenth District would want me to express for them the wish for many happy birthdays and a continuation of his great service in their behalf and in behalf of the people of this Nation and of the world.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, permit me to join with my colleagues in extending to you my heartiest congratulations and best wishes on your birthday. I know that Members are grateful for this opportunity to offer you our felicitations on your birthday because we admire and esteem you greatly—our distinguished Speaker.

I am sure I will not detract from the natural pride with which the great State of Texas holds one of her most distinguished sons when I point out to my colleagues that my own great State of Tennessee considers Speaker RAYBURN as one of her own. We in Tennessee are proud that our State gave this great and polished statesman, legislator, and parliamentarian to Texas and the Nation. Speaker RAYBURN had the good fortune to be born in Roane County, Tenn., in the majestic hills of the Cumberland Mountain chain. While it was fate's inscrutable verdict that he should live most of his life on the vast plains and sweeping ranges of Texas, we in Tennessee like to feel that he has taken with him something of the towering strength and wisdom of our hills—his native heath. And to that extent we hold great pride of possession toward this great Texan.

On your birthday anniversary, Mr. Speaker, from the people of my district, the Fifth District of Tennessee, who hold you in high esteem, and from myself personally, I wish to extend to you the sincerest felicitations of the day.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, it is not possible to pay adequate tribute to the man whom we honor today. Yet, I cannot refrain from joining with other friends in extending greetings and congratulations to Speaker SAM RAYBURN upon this occasion of his birthday. Moreover, in my capacity as a friend of the Speaker and as a Representative from Texas, I want to thank the House for the tribute which is being paid our distinguished friend from Texas today. The Speaker has made a wonderful record which has made its imprint upon national and international affairs and we cannot add to or detract from it today. For more than 34 years he has been an inspiration to those who have served with him in this body. Members in the House from Texas are especially indebted to the Speaker. His wise leadership and his friendly counsel and advice have been invaluable to us through the years.

Mr. Speaker, may you have many more happy birthdays and may the blessings of heaven be upon you all the days of your life.

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I am sure the fine people of my district would want to join me in expressing to you every good wish on this, your birthday anniversary. We wish for you all of the rich rewards to which your life of service has so eminently entitled you.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, as I came into this Chamber a little while ago, I noticed the House was in a gaysome mood. I learned that this is the birthday of our beloved Speaker, SAM RAYBURN; and naturally, we Members wanted to have something to say on this occasion.

SAM RAYBURN comes from that portion of Texas which is very near to the borders of the State of Louisiana. He lives on the banks of the same river—the Red River—which truantly passes the doors of my own home city of Shreveport, La. We people of Louisiana feel that we have much in common with our beloved Speaker. We know a lot about him and what we know is all to the good. As a neighbor, we have the habit of rising on occasions such as to pay tribute to the character and personality of this great American, who presides over this House with great firmness and with gentle dignity.

Mr. Speaker, several years ago, I had occasion to visit the home of SAM RAYBURN, at Bonham, Tex. It is located on the plains of this great State near the city of Bonham, Tex. It is a home sturdily built, intended to last a long time, and with heavy colonial columns in front of it. Inside, there is all of the warmth and welcome of a typical Texas home. Somehow, the home place with its strength and character on the outside, and on the inside the warmth and mellowness of the home, which is typical of the Southwest, impressed me as portraying the character and personality of our Speaker.

Serving as he has as Speaker for many years, SAM RAYBURN has shown both courage and kindness in handling the affairs of the Nation. In Washington, he has carried on the traditions of the Alamo, meeting opposition with a fierce courage and yet with fairness and impartiality. At the same time, he has brought to Washington a new standard of geniality and hospitality with a strong touch of the great Southwest to light the drab life of an otherwise blasé Washington. America and the world have learned to know him and to accept him as the great leader which he is in pointing the way to the dawn of a new day in the affairs of mankind.

Mr. Speaker, we honor you on this your natal day; and wish you many, many happy returns of this occasion.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to join in paying tribute to our friend and distinguished colleague and Speaker, SAM RAYBURN, on the occasion of his sixty-eighth birthday.

We of the Texas delegation are proud not only of this personal honor which has come to him in recognition of his outstanding service and qualities of leadership, but also of the honor to our great State of Texas.

We Texans who are privileged to serve in Congress with SAM RAYBURN have for him a warm affection and high esteem.

Let me wish for him many years more of the enjoyment of the true blessings of life to be found in good health, true and warm friendships, and the respect and admiration of one's fellow men.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the Speakership of the House of Representatives occupies a unique position in the Constitution of the United States and in the history of our country. The long line of able and distinguished men who have occupied that high position have exerted a more profound influence in the development of our form of government and on legislative and administrative procedures thereunder, and their contribution to the progress of the country and the welfare of our people than any other group of men with the single exception possibly of the Presidents of the United States.

As a matter of fact, the Speakership has exercised such extraordinary power that, under one Speaker at least, the President of the United States had to come hat in hand to the Speaker, in order to secure consideration of any legislation in which he was interested or which he might advocate.

The result of the election in 1910 pivoted solely upon the functions and prerogatives of the Speaker of the House of Representatives; and when the Democratic Party came into power with the Sixty-second Congress again the Speakership, its powers and administrations and prerogatives, was an important and determining factor in the election and the campaign preceding it.

But in the discussion here this morning complimentary to our Speaker, one fact was not mentioned which impresses me as constituting the most outstanding feature in his career and in the history of the Speakership itself. For many years the Speakership of Henry Clay has been the high light in length of incumbency in the Speaker's chair. Henry Clay resigned, I think, four times and was reelected four times; he is the only man ever to be elected Speaker on the first day he served in the House; but in the aggregate he served longer than any other Speaker in the history of the American Congress.

With the close of this session of Congress, Speaker RAYBURN will have broken that record and will have served in that eminent and influential position longer than any other man has ever served in the history of the Nation.

Furthermore, he has served through one of the most critical periods in American history. Probably no man has occupied the Speaker's chair during a period more significant, more fraught with peril to the Nation, during a period in which greater growth and progress was made in power and importance, both at home and abroad, so far as the American Republic is concerned than has our present Speaker, SAM RAYBURN, of Texas. He stands today at the pinnacle, both in length of service and in the significance of the time in which he has served and in service rendered his people. His term and magnitude of service is outstanding when measured by that of any of his predecessors since Speaker Muhlenberg first occupied the chair in 1789.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, respecting the fact that you might have wished to enjoin us from these public manifestations of our respect and esteem for you, although fortunately for us under the rules you cannot, I shall take up no more time, in order to relieve you from the position of being in the chair while a recipient of these utterances of respect for you.

The SPEAKER. From the bottom of a grateful heart, I thank you.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. EVINS].

THE LATE EWIN LAMAR DAVIS, OF TENNESSEE, DEVOTED HIMSELF TO A LIFE OF PUBLIC SERVICE AS JUDGE, CONGRESSMAN, AND FEDERAL ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, on this day we are happy to observe the birthday of our beloved Speaker, but it is with mixed emotion that I report the passing of a former Member of the House, one who served in Congress for 18 years.

During the adjournment of the last session of the Congress—on October 23, 1949—Tennessee lost one of her distinguished sons and the Nation an able and devoted public servant. I refer to the passing of my friend and predecessor in Congress from the Fifth District, Judge Ewin L. Davis, of Tennessee. Judge Davis was a member of the Federal Trade Commission at the time of his death and for 18 years was a Member of this distinguished body.

The passing of Judge Davis followed a long illness and interrupted with tragic untimeliness one of the most distinguished careers of devoted public service that this Nation has produced.

At the time of his passing, Judge Davis—as he was known throughout his career because of his service, while still a young man, as judge of the Seventh Judicial Circuit of Tennessee—was in his third term as a member of the Federal Trade Commission. He was originally appointed to the Commission by the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1933 shortly after that great statesman entered upon his duties as Chief Executive. President Roosevelt subsequently honored him once again by reappointment to this high post. President Truman, recognized, as did his predecessor, the sterling qualities and abilities of this distinguished Tennessean by calling upon him in 1946 to serve for a third 7-year term on the Commission.

Judge Ewin Lamar Davis was born in Bedford County, Tenn., February 5, 1876, one of a number of distinguished sons of Maclin H. Davis and Christina Shoffner Davis. Among his able and distinguished brothers was the late Norman H. Davis, one time Ambassador and chairman of the American Red Cross.

Judge Davis attended that fine old educational institution, Webb School at Bell Buckle, Tenn., and was graduated from Vanderbilt University at Nashville. He obtained his law degree from Columbian University, now known as George Washington University here in Washington.

Judge Davis started his career in public life in the city of Tullahoma, Coffee County, in the Fifth District of Tennessee, as an attorney. The rare qualities which make for unique and exceptional stature in public life and with which he was natively endowed came quickly to the forefront as he entered upon his law career and he was soon elected to the bench of the Seventh Judicial Circuit of Tennessee where he served from 1910 to 1918. In 1918 he was honored with election as Representative to Congress from the Fifth District of Tennessee. In Congress, Judge Davis served for a number of years as a member of the Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries Committee and as chairman of that committee during the Seventy-second Congress. He was also a member of other important committees of this body.

When, upon the request of President Roosevelt, Judge Davis entered upon a new career in administrative service, he brought to a close 18 years of able and productive years as a Member of Congress.

In 1946, George Washington University conferred upon him its alumni achievement award for notable attainment in the field of law. During the course of World War II, Judge Davis was presented with an award and medal for patriotic service in war finance during the years 1941–45 by the United States Department of the Treasury.

During the 18 years in which he represented the fifth district of Tennessee in Congress, Judge Davis' interests were devoted not only to his home district, but to the entire country in a high purpose of service to our country. I have often been told by older Members of this body that he held the affection of his colleagues and their high admiration—this regard having been earned by his own lovable nature, his probity and his brilliant energies.

In the FTC he became respected for his vigorous insistence upon the enforcement of antitrust laws and in the maintenance of free and fair competition in business and industry. Throughout his life, on the bench, in Congress, and as commissioner, he maintained an interest in young lawyers and their growth and development.

If I may have the indulgence of this body, I should like to speak in a personal vein about this man to whose memory we are pleased to pay tribute today. I was highly privileged, not many years after I had completed my law studies, to become a member of the staff of the Federal Trade Commission. Although I had known Judge Davis for many years of my life, it was in this capacity that I came to know fully the measure of this man. He was a tower of strength as a member of this great Commission. He served as chairman of the Commission three times. His judicial impartiality, his integrity, his friendliness and interest in the affairs of all who were employed by the Commission made him beloved and respected by all who knew him.

It was my sad privilege to join with hundreds of other Tennesseans when Judge Davis was laid to rest in the soil of his beloved native section of middle Tennessee and it came to my mind that this deep and sincere outpouring of friendship and admiration, which came so deeply and spontaneously from the hearts of his multitude of friends in Tennessee was a fitting manifestation of the devotion in which the judge was held by the people whom he had served so ably and with such distinction for so many years.

The memory of Judge Davis—jurist, legislator, administrator, will be cherished by all of his friends.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to have inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks a brief biographical summary of the career of Judge Ewin Lamar Davis:

Ewin Lamar Davis, of Tennessee; member of the Federal Trade Commission, Washington; born, Bedford County, Tenn., February 5, 1876; educated in various schools, including the famous Webb School and Vanderbilt University; graduated from Columbian (now George Washington) University Law School in 1899 with degree of bachelor of laws; began active practice of law in 1899; married Carolyn Windsor, of Americus, Ga., in 1898, and has five children; Presidential elector in 1904; judge of the seventh judicial circuit of Tennessee (nine counties), 1910–18; chairman of the district exemption board for the middle district of Tennessee, 1917–18; elected to the Sixty-sixth, Sixty-seventh, Sixty-eighth, Sixty-ninth, Seventieth, Seventy-first, and Seventy-second Congresses of the United States, 1919 to 1933; chairman, Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio and Fisheries during Seventy-second Congress; appointed by President Roosevelt as a member of the Federal Trade Commission, May 23, 1933, for term ending September 25, 1939; promptly confirmed by Senate and entered on duty May 26, 1933; reappointed by President Roosevelt, July 14, 1939, and promptly and unanimously confirmed by the Senate for term commencing September 26, 1939, and ending September 25, 1946; reappointed by President Truman, July 23, 1946, and unanimously confirmed by the Senate the next day, for term commencing September 26, 1946, and ending September 25, 1953; Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, 1935, 1940, and 1945; member of National Emergency Council, 1935; member of American National Committee, Third World Power Conference, 1936; alternate member, Temporary National Economic Committee, 1938–41, Democrat; member of bar, all courts of Tennessee, District of Columbia, and United States Supreme Court; American, District of Columbia, Federal, and George Washington Bar Association; received the George Washington University Alumni achievement award for notable achievement in law, 1945; Phi Delta Phi Legal Fraternity, Alpha Tau Omega Fraternity; Mason (thirty-second degree); legal residence, Tullahoma, Tenn.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVINS. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I served in this body during the time that Judge Davis was a Member. I soon learned to love and appreciate him as a sweet, gentle, and fine man. He was clean and wholesome. He was strong in character, loving and sympathetic in his relationships, and a credit to his State and to this body. He was a great soul, and I join with others in grieving his passing.

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVINS. I yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the eulogy just rendered by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. EVINS] is not only a splendid one but a deserving one in relation to Judge Davis, one of the outstanding Members of the House during his long years of devoted and faithful service in the Congress of the United States.

It was only a few months ago that I saw Judge Davis when he visited me in my office. It is with deep regret that I heard of his death, which is a personal loss to me.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVINS. I yield to the dean of the Tennessee delegation.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I heartily concur in the great tribute paid our distinguished Speaker on this occasion in conveying congratulations and felicitations on his birthday and wishing for him many years of continued happiness in public service.

I am also glad to have this opportunity to join with my colleague from Tennessee and others in paying brief but sincere tribute to the life, character, and public service of our warm friend and former colleague, Judge Ewin L. Davis, of Tennessee.

I attended his funeral services at his home in Washington a few days after the adjournment of the last session of Congress. It was my privilege to share the friendship of Judge Davis for many years and to serve with him as a Member of this body. He was a man who possessed the highest tributes of Christian character and all of the sterling qualities of manhood; a man who had a great and distinguished record as a lawyer, judge, and statesman. I join with others in conveying sincere sympathy to the members of his bereaved family.

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVINS. I yield to my colleague from Tennessee.

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I also concur in all of the statements that have been made about Judge Davis. I never had the opportunity of serving with him in the House. I knew him well as a very able Representative of a great district in Tennessee.

During the time I have served as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Judge Davis appeared many times before that committee when legislation affecting the Federal Trade Commission was before the committee. I do not believe I know of any other person whom I consider more devoted to the public interest than Judge Ewin L. Davis.

I join with others who mourn his passing and in extending sympathy to his family.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVINS. I yield to my distinguished colleague from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, the passing of the late Ewin L. Davis took from the active stage of life a man whose life had been remarkably singularly devoted to the public welfare.

The late Honorable Ewin L. Davis served well his community, his family, his State, his Nation, mankind. I believe the earth is better because of his life. This, I believe, was the aim of his life.

It was my sad duty to attend his funeral in Tennessee, but my heart was warmed to see the outpouring of distinguished citizenry to mourn his passing and do honor to his memory. It is now my honor and privilege to join in the great tributes that have already been given this worthy, distinguished, and honored citizen, whose passing we now mourn.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. EVINS. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, someone has said that "An honest man is the noblest work of God."

Never have I met a man in all my career for whose integrity I had a higher regard than I did for that of Ewin L. Davis, of Tennessee.

I not only served with him in the House, but I lived next door to him many years in the same apartment building and was well acquainted with his noble wife and his lovely daughters. I can safely say that Tennessee or any other State has never sent to this body a finer character, a man who lived more thoroughly and consciously by the standards of rectitude that should guide us all than this great man who served the State of Tennessee so well in this body and on the Federal Trade Commission.

His name will live long in the history of his State, and the principles for which he stood will live—

Till the sun grows cold,
And the stars are old,
And the leaves of the Judgment Book unfold.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD on the life, character, and public service of Ewin L. Davis.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. Speaker, you Members of the House who served with Judge Ewin L. Davis knew his great ability as a legislator and his loyal devotion to the great principles in which he believed.

I knew Judge Davis best as a Tennessean and as a friend who was loyal and devoted, and was honored and esteemed by all who knew him. He was a Tennessean of whom we were all proud.

Judge Davis had a long and distinguished career in each of the branches of our Government. He was elected judge of the seventh judicial circuit of Tennessee in 1918, when quite a young man and served with distinction as a judge in this circuit for 16 years. Later, he was elected to Congress from the Fifth District of Tennessee, which district he served for 18 years.

Judge Davis had a distinctive record in Congress and was known as being the author of the Radio Act of 1925, and much other important legislation.

It is rare that a public official has the privilege of serving in the three great branches of our Government. In addition to serving in Congress and on the bench, he served for a number of years as member of the Federal Trade Commission.

In the passing of Judge Davis, Tennessee has lost a beloved son and the Nation a valuable public servant.

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, our Nation mourns the loss of a great American, a distinguished statesman, a learned jurist, an able legislator and an exemplary Christian citizen in the death of Judge E. L. Davis, of Tennessee. He served the judiciary of Tennessee with honor and credit and was a member of the House of Representatives in the United States Congress where he served with great distinction prior to his appointment as a member of the Federal Trade Commission where he rendered outstanding service until his passing away.

Our State of Tennessee was justly proud of his record. He was a faithful, conscientious, industrious public servant. It was my pleasure and privilege to know Judge Davis for many years and my association with him was delightful and inspiring. His constructive record in life will stand as a lasting monument to his memory. We have truly lost one of God's noblemen in the departure of Judge Davis.

ECONOMIC REPORT TO THE CONGRESS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 388)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Joint Committee on the Economic Report, and ordered to be printed:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., January 6, 1950.

The honorable the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

The honorable the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIRS: I am presenting herewith my Economic Report to the Congress, as required under the Employment Act of 1946.

In preparing this report, I have had the advice and assistance of the Council of Economic Advisers, members of the Cabinet, and heads of independent agencies.

Together with this report, I am transmitting a report, the Annual Economic Review: January 1950, prepared for me by the Council of Economic Advisers in accordance with section 4 (c) (2) of the Employment Act of 1946.

Respectfully,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, will the gentleman tell us what is on the program for next week?

Mr. McCORMACK. The budget message will be sent up here on Monday. There is no further legislative business for next week. If this unanimous consent request is granted I expect to ask unanimous consent for adjournments next week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE NEXT WEEK

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Monday next it adjourn to meet on the following Thursday, and that when it adjourns on that Thursday it adjourn to meet on the following Monday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts tell us what the program will be for the following week.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am unable to state that now. That depends mainly on what the gentleman's committee does in cooperation with his leadership in getting rules out.

Mr. COLMER. Of course, the gentleman who reserved the right to object does not control that situation.

Mr. McCORMACK. I understand that, but the gentleman is a member of that committee. It will depend on what rules come out next week.

Mr. COLMER. May I ask if the distinguished majority leader will not defer the last part of his request until next week?

Mr. McCORMACK. Why, there is no business next week. All I am asking is that we adjourn until Thursday and from Thursday to Monday.

Mr. COLMER. The gentleman anticipates the House will meet on Thursday?

Mr. McCORMACK. Well, we have to.

Mr. COLMER. All I am asking the gentleman is that he withhold his unanimous-consent request from Thursday to Monday until we meet on Thursday of next week.

Mr. McCORMACK. Do I understand the gentleman would like me to withhold the request so far as adjourning from Thursday until the following Monday is concerned?

Mr. COLMER. I am asking the gentleman to withhold that particular request until Thursday next.

Mr. McCORMACK. Why, of course. If the gentleman asks me or if any Member asks me to do that, I would be glad to do it.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BIEMILLER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a speech by Hon. Oscar Ewing.

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an article appearing in Harper's magazine. I am informed by the Public Printer that this will exceed two pages of the RECORD and will cost $410, but I ask that it be printed notwithstanding that fact.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, notwithstanding the cost, the extension may be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. PRICE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

Mr. HUBER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

in the RECORD and include an address delivered by him.

Mr. STEED asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a magazine article.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a speech delivered by Gov. M. S. Szymczak, Federal Reserve Board, delivered on December 9, notwithstanding the fact that it may exceed the cost stipulated under the rule.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, notwithstanding the cost, the extension may be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. LYLE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an excerpt.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. KEE asked and was given permission to address the House for 20 minutes on Monday next, following any special orders heretofore entered.

CORRECTION OF ROLL CALL

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, the permanent RECORD of the last session of Congress reflects that I was absent on roll call No. 19—a quorum call—on February 21, 1949. This is in error. The facts are, Mr. Speaker, that I was present and answered to my name on each and every roll call of the session.

This error was not discovered until my voting record, as supplied by the Clerk of the House, was delivered to my office a few weeks ago and after final adjournment.

The permanent RECORD having been printed and realizing it is now too late to correct same, I have requested an opportunity to make this statement so that this record might reflect that the aforesaid RECORD is in error and that I was present and so answered when my name was called on roll call No. 19 on February 21, 1949.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BRYSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include in each a newspaper article.

Mr. BECKWORTH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in regard to war claims.

Mr. MADDEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in regard to the late Martin Gorski.

Mr. JENSEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. RICH (at the request of Mr. JENSEN) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include three editorials.

Mr. REED of New York asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and in each to include extraneous matter.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and in one to include a memorial address delivered by Representative DOLLIVER to the Elks at their annual memorial services at Rapid City, S. Dak., the second extension being an appreciation of the service of the late George Bates, of Massachusetts.

Mr. COLE of New York (at the request of Mr. ARENDS) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include in each a statement and an editorial.

Mr. PLUMLEY (at the request of Mr. ARENDS) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WILSON of Indiana (at the request of Mr. ARENDS) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HARVEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. GOODWIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and in one to include extraneous matter.

Mr. DOLLIVER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an essay by a student from Glidden, Iowa.

Mr. LODGE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include in each an editorial.

Mr. LEFEVRE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD and include an article by Mr. Walter Johnson, of Heathsville, Va.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in two instances, in one to include a highly appreciated speech that was made by a young high-school student in a radio broadcast at a Lions Club program in my district on the subject of democracy in social science, the name of the young lady being Miss Sally Jo Wade; and in the other to include a talk by a fine young high-school student by the name of Miss Nona Dalton on the subject of democracy in the student council.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

TRAGIC SITUATION IN COAL INDUSTRY

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD on the subject of the tragic situation in the coal industry.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the time has come for the President or Congress to act in the coal strike. Right now John L. Lewis is more powerful than the Government of the United States. Mr. Truman says there is no emergency. Can this be true when the Government orders a one-third slash in service on coal-burning railroads? Can it be true when surveys of coal supplies in my district show that there is only enough coal available in coal yards to supply needs for a few days in the event of severe winter weather? In one of my large industrial cities—Janesville—I am informed the hospital has a 1-week supply of coal on hand, that manufacturers and public institutions are going along on a hand-to-mouth daily basis. Then there is the coal that is used for heating homes and millions of consumers will feel the pinch when severe winter weather sets in. All of the States in the north will be affected. Yet, the President says there is no emergency.

Mr. Speaker, no one in this Nation will escape the crisis in coal under the dictatorship of John L. Lewis who is exercising a monopolistic control over this vital commodity. Lewis has a stranglehold on the jugular vein of our economy. He is ruthless in his decree that the miners who are in his union can work only 3 days a week. It amounts to a criminal offense against the public interest. This is a situation that calls for action by Congress in view of the President's refusal to act.

Mr. Speaker, it is reported that there is about a 40-day supply of coal on hand—too little for safety. This is a conspiracy against the public and it is time that Congress started an investigation with John L. Lewis as the first witness.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, I may be permitted to address the House for 40 minutes to discuss the agricultural state of the Union in general and the oleo situation in particular.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next, following any special orders heretofore granted, I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HALE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

Mr. ALLEN of California asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a radio address.

Mr. McDONOUGH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and include some resolutions and other extraneous matter.

Mr. VURSELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the very serious and critical coal situation affecting Mount Vernon, Ill., and the Twenty-fourth Congressional District of Illinois.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, following the reading of the message of the President, and after the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk, and the conclusion of special orders heretofore granted, I may address the House for 15 minutes, to discuss the budget.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SHAFER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances, in two instances to include editorials.

1950 COTTON ALLOTMENTS

Mr. REGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks and include a newspaper item.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. REGAN. Mr. Speaker, the cotton farmers and producers of our Nation find themselves faced with a most serious situation with respect to their planting and crop for the coming season.

Planting time will soon be upon them, and confusion, misunderstanding, and rank discriminations are coming to the attention of most every Member of Congress and particularly to those from cotton-growing areas.

No section, county, or State is without inequities, uncertainties, and confusion.

Most all of this has been brought about by a series of laws, directives, interpretations, and the jockeying about by various individuals and organizations seeking the age-old custom of self-preservation to the point, in many instances, of utter selfishness.

Obviously, this situation needs and demands the immediate consideration of the Congress to the end that the air may be cleared, the confusion eliminated, and the Department of Agriculture have a definite, foolproof, simplified formula to proceed on for the 1950 season which is fair and equitable to every cotton planter in the Nation and would not adversely affect the economy of any community, county, or State that depends on the growing of cotton for their livelihood.

Fortunately, when a calamity hits our country a man rises to the occasion to point the way, not as Mark Twain said about the weather—people talk about it but never do anything about it.

This crisis in the cotton situation is answered by the plan outlined by my good friend, George B. Hall, of Pecos, Tex., which is submitted for the RECORD, and which was presented to the Secretary of Agriculture some 3 weeks ago, and so far as I know the Secretary has not offered an objection to it.

It should simplify the whole matter, permit deserving veterans to stay on their farms, to which they have but recently returned, and save thousands of deserving farmers from bankruptcy with which they are now faced, with the multiple conflicting laws and regulations respecting this year's planting, and, I repeat, this simple formula would be fair to all; no one could possibly be hurt, no slick operator would have a distinct and wholly selfish advantage, and our 1950 cotton crop would be held well within demand.

(The newspaper item is as follows:)

PECOS MAN OFFERS SOLUTION TO COTTON ALLOTMENT QUARREL

PECOS.—George B. Hall, Pecos, believes he has the solution to the cotton-allotment program which is causing many farmers, especially those who first produced cotton in 1949, so much worry.

In a letter addressed to Charles B. Brannan, Secretary of Agriculture, released to the press, Hall gives a 10-point program of how the cotton-acreage program can be handled.

Copies of the letter were sent to the Senators and Congressmen from Texas and the press.

In a meeting of some 50 farmers and businessmen here last week, Congressman KEN REGAN promised he would do his best to get the Department of Agriculture to help those farmers whose allotments had been severely slashed. Since that time, REGAN has made an appeal to the Department and to members of the House Agriculture Committee for changes.

In the meantime, Congressman BOB POAGE, Waco, a members of the Agriculture Committee, has said he will attempt to get changes made in the law. Senator TOM CONNALLY, visiting in Marlin, said Tuesday, "There is hope the Agriculture Department will do something about the cotton allotments."

LETTER FOLLOWS

Hall's letter to the Secretary of Agriculture follows in part:

"During the past 12 months there has been much weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth among farmers, Congressmen, Senators, and all connected with the cotton industry in regard to the cotton-acreage control. Now that allotments have been announced, turmoil is even worse. There are certain facts that we should face fairly and squarely with open minds and lack of selfishness. I offer a 10-point program which is fair to everyone connected with the cotton industry and that will solve the cotton-reduction program as well as get Production and Marketing Administration out of a ticklish situation.

"First. We must admit the present plan of cotton allotment, as interpreted by the Department of Agriculture, is unfair, discriminating, and unworkable.

"Second. We much recognize that the bill was made to pacify certain selfish whims and must be revised. There is nothing reasonable in giving one farm a 1950 allotment of only 7 percent of the acres planted in 1949, while other farms will receive more than planted in 1949."

ACREAGE MONOPOLY

"Third. We must recognize that any locality or section which tries to monopolize future cotton acreage is acting as a restraint of trade and should be dealt with as any other monopolistic tactic.

"Fourth. We must recognize that Public Law 12, as applied, completely unbalances the natural trend of cotton production and must be repealed. Farmers grew the supposedly called war crops because it was economical to grow them and for no other reason.

"Fifth. 1949 is the only true barometer of cotton production trends. All sections where it is economical and logical to plant cotton planted it in 1949.

"Sixth. Why not attempt a plan that is simple, fair, and equitable instead of a long, complicated formula which people do not understand and which is loaded with secret clauses and gadgets to get more acres for a given area than is deserving just to satisfy selfish interests.

"Seventh. The only plan that will work without wrecking the economy of some sections, that is fair and equitable to all cotton producers, is a plan based on a percentage reduction of 1949 cotton acres."

WOULD WRECK ECONOMY

"Eighth. The national acreage has been reduced only approximately 23 percent. This reduction, if equally distributed, would wreck the economy of no locality and should be acceptable to all concerned. A simple solution to the complicated affair is to take 1949 acres planted in cotton, allocate 70 percent of the acres planted in cotton in 1949 to the different States, counties, and farms. This would leave 7 percent in the national pool to be allocated to States for hardship cases, farms that normally have grown cotton but were prevented from so doing due to catastrophe, such as drought, hail or storm, and new acres and small farms.

"Ninth. It should be recognized that some sections can grow cotton and cotton only, while there are other sections which can grow other crops just as profitably and successfully as cotton. The economy of these sections which can grow cotton and cotton only should not be wrecked to give acres to sections which will only grow cotton to preserve their acreage allotment.

"Tenth. It must be recognized that something must be done and quickly to prevent disaster to the cotton industry as a whole, and more especially to the individual farmers who are threatened with annihilation. Why not be practical for just this case and expedite legislation early in January as outlined above to alleviate this acute situation?"

1950 COTTON ALLOTMENTS

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman has just indicated, the cotton situation is very acute at this time in certain sections of the Nation. I have a letter written by the Solicitor of the Department of Agriculture, dated January 4, 1950. He says:

I have your letter of December 30, 1949. You request me to have prepared such amendments to the present cotton quota law as will bring it into agreement with the ideas of the Department of Agriculture. I have come to the conclusion—

And this is the important part—

as you were tentatively informed by me on the telephone that the provisions of the present cotton quota law are so integrated that it is impossible to so change the law by particular amendments as to bring it into accord with the views of the Department.

I have another letter by Mr. Frank Wooley, of the Cotton Division. He says:

We are making a study of the allotment apportionments which have been made for 1950 to farms, but have not formulated as yet any specific recommendations for changes in Public Law 272.

Just the other day I talked at length with Mr. Brannan, the Secretary of Agriculture. I asked him what they proposed to do about this situation, a situation where, for example, in one of my counties we have 1,300 of what is called "new farms" with only a thousand acres to distribute among 1,300 farms. At least 400 farms will likely make a request for acreage. This is a regrettable situation. Something must be done.

Here is what I want to request —whatever is done—that we have a record of the attitude and the feeling of the Department of Agriculture on whatever recommendation comes before the Congress to help correct these inequities. I think it is fair to have this.

I include the two letters referred to in full:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR,
Washington, D. C., January 4, 1950.

HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: I have your letter of December 30, 1949. You request me to have prepared such amendments to the present cotton quota law as will bring it into agreement with the ideas of the Department.

I have come to the conclusion, as you were tentatively informed by me on the telephone, that the provisions of the present cotton quota law are so integrated that it is impossible to so change the law by particular amendments as to bring it into accord with the views of the Department.

The Department's views as to cotton marketing quotas were presented in two drafts of legislation for consideration prior to the passage of the present cotton quota law. I enclose these drafts for your consideration.

There is, of course, to be considered the extremely important question of the advisability of undertaking completely to rewrite the law so as to make it applicable to the 1950 crop of cotton. The administration of the present law has reached such a stage that an entirely new approach would cause great confusion.

Sincerely,

W. CARROLL HUNTER, Solicitor

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., January 4, 1950.

HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your telephone request of December 29, 1949, to Mr. Wilson C. Tucker of the Cotton Branch, relative to the Department's recommendations made to the Eighty-first Congress concerning cotton acreage allotments and marketing quotas, present recommendations pertaining to Public Law 272, Eighty-first Congress, and replies to your letters to the Department dealing with cotton allotments for 1950.

The Department's basic recommendations made to the Eighty-first Congress, relative to certain acreage allotments and marketing quotas for 1950 and subsequent years are contained in S. 1971, a bill introduced in the Senate on May 31, 1949, by Senator ELMER THOMAS.

For information concerning the Department's recommendations relative to Public Law 272, Eighty-first Congress, we refer you to the following:

1. Hearings before the Committee on Agriculture and the Special Cotton Subcommittee, House of Representatives, Eighty-first Congress, first session, January 7, 11, 12, 13, 15, 19, 25, 26, 28, 31, and February 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 9, and 11, 1949, serial E.

2. Hearings before a subcommittee on Agriculture and Forestry, United States Senate, Eighty-first Congress, first session, on S. 1962 held on June 14, 15, 22, and 27, 1949.

3. Hearings before the Special Subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives, Eighty-first Congress, on H. R. 5392, on June 29, 30, and July 1, 5, 6, 7, and 15, 1949.

We are making a study of the allotment apportionments which have been made for 1950 to farms, but have not formulated as yet any specific recommendation for changes in Public Law 272, Eighty-first Congress, concerning this matter. During recent weeks representatives of the Production and Marketing Administration, particularly the Cotton Branch, have been very hard pressed in formulating the necessary regulations, instructions, forms, and performing field work associated with meeting the December 15, 1949, date, required by law, in connection with cotton allotments for 1950. This legislation, being new in many of its provisions and quite complex in its application, has also resulted in an unusually large number of congressional letters, as well as direct mail from individual farmers. Thus, the replies to mail concerning this subject have been delayed much longer than we would normally expect. We will expedite the handling of all this corespondence, including your letters, as rapidly as possible.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK WOOLLEY,
Deputy Administrator.

United States	22,308,486	289,994	177,000	275,480	22,500,000	21,000,000

[1] 1945–48 average acreage planted or regarded as planted to cotton, except for Oklahoma such average is for the 5-year, 1944–48, period.

[2] Acreage allotted or which would have been allotted had the 4 percent State acreage reserve been sufficient under subsec. 344 (g) (1) and (2) of the 1938 Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, prior to the enactment of Public Law 272, 81st Cong., for establishing allotments under subsec. 344 (d) (1) of such Act.

[3] Larger of 95 percent of the 1947–48 average acreage actually planted to cotton or 85 percent of the acreage actually planted to cotton in 1948 less the sum of the acreages in columns (2) and (3).

[4] Since the United States totals of columns (2), (3), and (4) equals 22,775,480 acres, 275,480 acres were deducted to provide a national acreage allotment base of 22,500,000 acres. Such amount was deducted pro rata on the basis of the initial State acreage allotment bases in column (2) for each State for which the total of columns (2) and (3) exceeds the larger of 95 percent of the 1947–48 average acreage actually planted to cotton or 85 percent of the acreage actually planted to cotton in 1948. On first trial, it was determined that a straight pro rata deduction based on the initial State acreage allotment bases in column (2) would cause the State acreage allotment base for Texas to be less than 95 percent of the 1947–48 average acreage actually planted to cotton. Consequently, the deduction in column (5) was limited to 119,654 acres for that State, thereby causing the State acreage allotment base in column (6) to equal 95 percent of such 1947–48 average acreage. The remaining acreage of 155,826 acres (275,480–119,654) was deducted pro rata from the initial base acreages for other applicable States as follows:

(a) A total was obtained of the initial acreage allotment bases in column (2) for Alabama, Arizona, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee and Virginia. Such total equals 10,789,788 acres.

(b) A deduction factor of 1.44420 percent was obtained by dividing 155,826 by 10,789,788.

(c) The deduction factor was applied to the initial acreage allotment base in column (2) for each State listed in item (a). Such product is shown in column (5) for each of the applicable States.

[5] Sum of column (2), (3) and (4) minus column (5).

[6] Pursuant to section 344 (k) of the act, a minimum 1950 State acreage allotment for Nevada of 110 acres equaling the acreage actually planted to cotton in that State in 1948, which was the largest for the three years, 1946, 1947, and 1948, was established for the State. The remainder of the 1950 national acreage allotment was apportioned to the remainder of the States as follows:

(a) An apportionment factor of 0.9333323 was obtained by dividing 20,999,890 (21,000,000–101) by 22,499,906 (22,500,000—94, which is the State acreage allotment base in column (6) for Nevada).

(b) The apportionment factor was applied to the State acreage allotment base in column (6) for each remaining State. The product is shown in column (7) as the 1950 State acreage allotment.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., January 4, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: Under date of December 19, 1949, Mr. A. J. Loveland, Under Secretary, transmitted to you a table showing the official cotton acreage allotments for the years 1940, 1941, 1942, and 1950 for counties in the State of Texas. A copy of his letter is attached.

There is also attached the same type of information for the cotton-producing counties in the other States for the year 1942 as you had requested of the Secretary's office.

Very truly yours,

JOHN H. DEAN,
Assistant Director.

DECEMBER 19, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This acknowledges your letter of December 2 requesting county cotton acreage allotments for Texas for the years 1940, 1941, 1942, and 1950.

There is attached a tabulation showing the official county acreage allotments for the years requested. It should be noted, however, that these figures do not include the entire acreage allotted to farms in the counties for such years. The additional acreages to be allotted for new farms, for small-farm increases, and for adjustments in small-farm allotments are not shown for 1950, and similar acreages are not shown for the years 1940, 1941, and 1942. The attached data for the respective years, however, are comparable.

Sincerely yours,

A. J. LOVELAND,
Under Secretary.

MISS ELIZABETH A. McGEE

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, Miss Elizabeth A. McGee, one of South Carolina's fair teen-agers, a resident of Spartanburg in my district, has been chosen under keen competition to represent all the Cotton States as Maid of Cotton.

It is entirely fitting that Miss McGee should reign as queen since her home is in the largest textile district in the world. Having won this distinction in Tennessee recalls to mind that one of South Carolina's sons blazed the trail for her by going to Tennessee and after accomplishing many outstanding feats, became one of our great Democratic Presidents. As President he not only balanced the budget but left office without a national debt.

I am sure my colleagues join me in extending heartiest congratulations to Miss McGee, and look forward to meeting her personally when she visits the Nation's Capital.

"THE SUN HAS SET"

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the New York Evening Sun has set, never to rise again. It was a paper famous in the annals of New York journalistic history, and it was a paper to reckon with.

Unfortunately, however, latterly it catered only to the carriage trade, and as the aristocrats in New York grew fewer in number, its circulation grew smaller. Its hard-shelled conservatism, the ferocity of its hatred for Franklin D. Roosevelt, the violence of its opposition to the New Deal, could not save it.

The World-Telegram, an exemplary paper with excellent coverage, has swallowed it. The World-Telegram calls itself an independent and liberal paper. There is no doubt about its independence, but there is about its liberalism. It, too, played the wrong horses. It bet on the illiberal Dewey and on the illiberal Dulles. It, too, resents the Fair Deal.

However, we wish the World-Telegram and its publisher, Roy Howard, and its editor, Lee Wood, and their colleagues good fortune in the merger with the Sun. They are able men. May they see the light of real liberalism.

THE FUEL SITUATION

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, events of our time make it absolutely necessary that we face with reality the critical state of the Nation's petroleum reserves, and that we take immediate steps for the conservation of those reserves.

Our military security is threatened by the critical state of our petroleum reserves, and we are also faced with the situation that oil and gas-heated homes will be cold in a national emergency.

Our domestic oil industry now has almost no reserve productive capacity such as existed at the outbreak of World War II and without which victory would have been in doubt.

I have today introduced a resolution calling for an investigation into the Nation's fuel reserves, and particularly into the critical state of our reserve supply of petroleum and natural gas.

I am convinced that such an investigation will bring out publicly that first, this Nation will soon face a shortage of domestic petroleum production; second, we are needlessly wasteful in the use of oil and natural gas; third, we cannot rely on increased imports in the event of war; fourth, we cannot rely for years to come, and then only at a cost of billions of dollars, on the development of synthetic fuels, except from natural gas; fifth, many coal mines are being abandoned, "drowned out," and permanently lost as a natural resource; sixth, our railroads will be endangered both financially and physically, and there will be a shortage of locomotives and railroad cars.

In the event of a military emergency our survival will inevitably depend on oil. Estimates indicate that the defense forces will need double the crippling amounts they required in World War II, or 3,500,000 barrels a day. Without this oil, they will not be able to move planes, ships, tanks, guns or men on a global front. I estimate that home owners will get less than half of their oil requirements. That means cold homes. Natural gas may be shut off entirely in the eastern territory.

The general public must be told again and again of the seriousness of this situation and made aware of the consequences to the individual. Home owners' needs will have to compete sharply with those of national defense, air lines, factories, mechanized farms, trucks, railroads, water carriers, and other mobile users.

Considering the dangerous shortage of fuel oil which the country will certainly experience if there is any national emergency, I was shocked to discover that the Army and Navy, for example, are using many millions of gallons of this military essential to heat buildings in areas which are abundantly supplied with nearby coal. Veterans' Administration buildings use millions more. Many of these buildings were originally designed to burn coal. New Federal housing projects use fuel oil almost exclusively.

Heating of Government buildings with irreplaceable fuel oil and natural gas is increasing. Although this is only one element in the situation, it is important not only in terms of millions of gallons of oil and billions of cubic feet of gas, but equally important in setting a bad national example.

If it were possible to produce our estimated reserves of oil and natural gas at the current rate, we would have no oil in 12 years—no natural gas in about 25 years. We have almost limitless reserves of coal.

Many thousands of new homes have been constructed to burn gas or oil, and cannot be converted to the use of solid fuel without practically rebuilding the entire structure.

The impact of these developments on our railroad transportation system must also be considered. World War II demonstrated beyond a doubt the absolute necessity for maintaining our railroads at or near peak efficiency. During these critical years, these roads handled 97 percent of all military and naval personnel within the country, and 90 percent of all war freight.

A serious decline in solid-fuel traffic, which now amounts to more than a third of all rail freight, will be followed by a corresponding decline in equipment, and will impair the ability of the railroads to meet a military or other transportation emergency.

The present situation with regard to depletion of oil and natural gas reserves in this country is too serious to be allowed to continue without taking corrective measures. An investigation by a Joint Committee on Fuel Policy to ascertain the facts and to inform the public of them, I believe, will prove the necessity for remedial legislation and a national fuels policy.

THE COAL SITUATION

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday the President appeared before us and had much to say about advancing the welfare of all the people. He professed adherence to the American ideal of the greatest happiness for the greatest number and equal justice to all. With an apparently new-found fluency of language, he sought to clothe his ruinous socialistic program with all the blessings of the proven American principles of freedom and opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, if President Truman really seeks to serve all the people and to protect the many from the arrogant greediness of a selfish few, he would have intervened in the current coal strike. If President Truman really wishes to curb monopolies he deems so dangerous to our system of free enterprise, he would use the power vested in him under existing law to curb the abuses of a labor monopoly depriving people of employment and our American homes of heat from the winter cold.

The coal-shortage situation in my State of Illinois is acute. For instance, a large coal dealer on the west side of Chicago, who serves many hundreds of customers, has on hand and in transit only 1,800 tons of coal. A year ago his inventory was 11,800. In other words, he has on hand only a 4 days' supply for his customers as against a normal 30 days' supply.

I could cite innumerable other examples. I can cite a number of small communities in Illinois that are entirely out of coal: Mount Morris, the little village of Malta, the village of Forreston, and the village of Genoa. And so on through the list.

This crisis in which homes, schools, and hospitals are without heat, and in which thousands of coal miners are unwillingly deprived of work, has been created by one man—John L. Lewis. And the responsibility for its continuation is that of one man—President Truman.

Last September I appealed to the President to exercise the authority vested in him by the emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. By using the machinery provided by that act for such emergencies as this, where our national health and safety are imperiled, the President can obtain the continued production of coal for at least a period of 80 days. Within that time there will be opportunity to obtain a peaceful settlement of the dispute and, in the meantime, our people will not suffer from the winter cold for the lack of fuel.

I introduced at that time a resolution calling upon the President to exercise his authority. But it was allowed to lie in the committee with no consideration whatever.

Mr. Speaker, it may be that President Truman feels he owes a political debt to certain labor union monopolists. But no political debt to any minority pressure group should be paid at the expense of the American people as a whole.

In refusing to invoke the Taft-Hartley Act the excuse is used that no emergency exists. The question is: What constitutes an emergency? As one of my friends has aptly asked: "Must we wait until people are herded into heating centers and businesses and public buildings shut down before action is taken?"

Mr. Speaker, as representatives of the people we have a direct responsibility to the people. I call upon the Committee on Education and Labor to institute an immediate investigation of the facts. Such an investigation will reveal the very critical situation that exists. Such an investigation will show that a real emergency exists in which any President, if he honestly seeks to serve all the people and not just a selfish monopolistic few, cannot fail to act.

If the committee would merely hold a hearing on the resolution I introduced last September, it would obtain the factual evidence of the existing emergency that would, I am sure, persuade the Committee to report my resolution that the Congress as a whole may express itself for the people as a whole.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HINSHAW, for 10 days.

To Mr. SMITH of Kansas (at the request of Mr. HOPE), indefinitely, on account of death in his family.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 1 minute p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Monday, January 9, 1950, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

MONDAY, JANUARY 9, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 4, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God who hath taught us to pray for the coming of Thy kingdom, strengthen all who are striving after true brotherhood and who are working for justice and peace. Restrain in us and in all men every temper which makes for war, all ungenerous judgments, all presumptuous claims, all promptings of self-assertion. Make us ready to recognize the needs and aspirations of other peoples and grant us the will to do what we can to remove misunderstanding and suspicion, at home and abroad. Give us courage and strength for the vast task of social rebuilding that needs to be dared if life for all men, under all skies, is to be made full and free. We ask it in the name that is above every name. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying budget, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

(For President's message, see today's proceedings of the House of Representatives on pp. 207–231.)

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following routine business was transacted:

REPORT ON LEND-LEASE OPERATIONS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 436)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am transmitting herewith the Twenty-ninth Report to Congress on Lend-Lease Operations, for the quarter ending June 30, 1949.

This report contains in appendix I a Report on Lend-Lease Fiscal Operations, prepared by the Treasury Department and submitted to the Secretary of State in accordance with Executive Order 9726. This fiscal report covers the period from March 11, 1941, through June 30, 1949.

In April 1949 the Dominican Republic and Venezuela completed payment of their accounts under their respective lend-lease agreements.

A settlement agreement was signed with Ethiopia on May 20, 1949, and appears in this report as appendix II.

On September 27, 1949, understanding was reached with Soviet representatives as to the dates and procedures for the return of 3 icebreakers and 27 frigates of the United States Navy which had been made available to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics under lend-lease. Negotiations with the Soviet Union on other lend-lease matters have resulted in some progress but as yet there has been no substantial agreement on several of the major issues.

Other lend-lease activities during the period covered by this report included the continuation of final settlement negotiations and other winding-up activities, described more fully in the report itself.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 9, 1950.

(Enclosure: Twenty-ninth Report to Congress on Lend-Lease Operations.)

REPORT ON OPERATIONS OF UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND REHABILITATION ADMINISTRATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 437)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith the Twentieth Quarterly Report of expenditures and operations under the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration Joint Resolution, Public Law 267, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved March 28, 1944. This report covers the period from April 1, 1949, through June 30, 1949.

In view of the fact that the United States appropriations for participation in UNRA expired for expenditure purposes on June 30, 1949, this is the last report which will be submitted.

The unexpended balance of $2,642,209.08 remaining under the United States appropriations will revert to the surplus fund in the United States Treasury. Any unpaid claims against this balance are subject to presentation to the General Accounting Office for direct settlement in the usual manner.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 9, 1950.

(Enclosure: Twentieth Quarterly Report.)

REPORT ON FOREIGN SERVICE RETIREMENT AND DISABILITY SYSTEM—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 438)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State, showing all receipts and disbursements on account of refunds, allowances, and annuities for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1949, in connection with the Foreign Service retirement and disability system as required by section 862, Foreign Service Act of 1946 (Public Law 724).

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 9, 1950.

(Enclosure: Report concerning retirement and disability fund, Foreign Service.)

By Mr. GREEN:

A resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island; to the Committee on Finance:

"Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States of America to pass legislation repealing excise taxes, or luxury taxes, so-called

"Whereas jewelry manufacturing is a major source of employment for the people of this State, since Rhode Island stands first throughout the United States in output of production in this field; and

"Whereas luxury taxes, so-called, were applied against this industry in time of war for the laudable purpose of preventing inflation and so that employment might be diverted to the war industries; and

"Whereas the war is now over and the retention of these taxes has the effect of reducing employment in Rhode Island by reason of sales resistance to our jewelry products: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations hereby memorializes and petitions the Congress of the United States of America to pass, and the President of the United States to approve, if passed, legislation repealing excise taxes, or luxury taxes, so-called; and be it further

"Resolved, That duly certified copies of this resolution be transmitted by the secretary of state to the President of the United States and to the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States earnestly requesting the latter to use every effort to have the present legislation repealed which now provides for such taxes."

STUDY OF INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS WITH STATES AND MUNICIPALITIES AND INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. O'CONOR, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 205), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That in holding hearings, reporting such hearings, and making investigations as authorized by subsection (g) (2) (D) of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized during the period beginning on February 16, 1950, and ending on February 15, 1951, to make such expenditures, and to employ upon a temporary basis such investigators, and such technical, clerical, and other assistants, as it deems advisable.

SEC. 2. The expenses of the committee under this resolution (which shall not exceed $15,000 for studying intergovernmental relations with the States and municipalities or $18,000 for studying relations with international organizations) shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee or subcommittee, as the case may be.

STUDY OF OPERATION OF GOVERNMENT ACTIVITIES

Mr. O'CONOR, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 206), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That in holding hearings, reporting such hearings, and making investigations as authorized by subsection (g) (2) (B) of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, or any other duties imposed upon it, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized during the period beginning on February 1, 1950, and ending on January 31, 1951, to make such expenditures, and to employ upon a temporary basis such investigators, and such technical, clerical, and other assistants, as it deems advisable.

SEC. 2. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $100,000, in addition to any unexpended balance under Senate Resolution 52, Eighty-first Congress, first session, agreed to February 10, 1949, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee or subcommittee, as the case may be.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES—EXCISE TAX REDUCTION AMENDMENT

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, at this time I submit an amendment to the measure under consideration, H. R. 2023, and ask that my proposed amendment be printed.

By way of explanation, the amendment would reduce excise taxes and is identical with section 3 of H. R. 3905, a bill which was reported favorably by the Senate Finance Committee last July and is now Order No. 644 on the Senate Calendar. I want to emphasize that in preparing this amendment, I have made no changes whatever from the language as it appears in section 3 of H. R. 3905. Although I have several other amendments to present at the appropriate time, I have limited this amendment to those reductions in excises which have been approved by the Senate Finance Committee.

In brief, the amendment would repeal the war tax rates imposed by the Revenue Act of 1943 on jewelry, furs, toilet preparations, electric light bulbs and tubes, communications, transportation of persons and admissions, and restore the rates which were imposed prior to that act. It would also repeal the retail tax on luggage and restore the former manufacturers' tax, and would reduce the tax on photographic apparatus, including films, to a uniform rate of 10 percent. Restoration of the manufacturers' tax on luggage would apply to fewer articles than the present retail tax and would remove the tax entirely from ladies' handbags, for example. The Senate report on H. R. 3905, Report No. 646, explains this matter clearly, and I ask that section 3 of the report be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, section 3 of the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION 3

Section 3 of the bill repeals the war tax rates imposed by the Revenue Act of 1943 on jewelry, furs, toilet preparations, electric light bulbs and tubes, communications, transportation of persons, and the retail tax on luggage. The repeal of the retail tax on luggage will restore the manufacturers' tax of 10 percent.

The manufacturers' tax on luggage applies to fewer articles than the retail tax. The manufacturers' tax applies only to trunks, valises, traveling bags, suitcases, hat boxes for use by travelers, fitted toilet cases (not including contents), and other travelers' luggage, and leather and imitation leather brief cases. Section 3 also provides for the reduction of the tax on photographic apparatus. The tax on cameras and camera equipment is reduced from 25 percent to 10 percent, and on films from 15 percent to 10 percent.

In the case of jewelry, watches selling at retail for not more than $65, and alarm clocks selling at retail for not more than $5 continue to be taxed at 10 percent.

The following table shows the reductions in rates and the loss in revenue involved on a full-year basis:

Estimated loss in revenue from excise-tax reductions under sec. 3[1]

[Amounts in millions of dollars]

	Section of code	Present rates	Rates under sec. 3	Estimated revenue, full year		Estimated reduction in revenue, full year
				Present rates	Rates under sec. 3
Admissions	1700 (a)	1 cent for each 5 cents or major fraction.	1 cent for each 10 cents or fraction.	384	211	173
Electric-light bulbs	3406 (a) (10)	20 percent	5 percent	27	7	20
Furs	2401	do	10 percent	58	32	26
Jewelry	2400 [2]	do [2]	do	200	121	79
Luggage:
Retailers' excise tax	1651	do	None	75		75
Manufacturers' excise tax	304	None	10 percent		9	+9
Toilet preparations	2402	20 percent	do	93	49	44
Telephone, telegraph, radio, etc.:
Local telephone	3465 (a)	15 percent	do	225	158	67
All other	3465 (a)	8 to 25 percent	5 to 20 percent	310	246	64
Transportation of persons	3469	15 percent	10 percent	240	168	72
Photographic apparatus	3406 (a) (4)	15 to 25 percent.	do	42	25	17
Total				1,654	1,026	628

[1] Amounts shown represent estimated reductions in excise-tax collections. These estimates take account of increased consumption resulting from the reduced rates. They do not reflect any increases in income taxes because of lower business deductions. If effect is given to this factor the loss may be reduced by about $50,000,000. Larger profits which might result from increased sales could reduce the revenue loss still further.

[2] Except watches selling at retail for not more than $65 and alarm clocks selling at retail for not more than $5, the rate on both of which is 10 percent.

The war excise-tax rates were imposed along with the excess-profits tax and heavy corporation income taxes and individual income taxes. The excess-profits tax has been repealed, and individual and corporate income taxes reduced. It is believed only fair that some reduction should be made in the war excise-tax rates, which are interfering with consumer purchasing power and are increasing the cost of doing business.

Mr. BUTLER. The estimated loss in revenue from these reductions, as shown by the table in the Senate report, would amount to $628,000,000 on a full year's basis, and I suspect that even that figure is exaggerated since for some of these industries sales have dropped off so sharply because of the tax that the anticipated revenue from present rates is not being realized.

Mr. President, in my judgment, these excise-tax reductions are long overdue. When these taxes were imposed, the Nation and the industries concerned were promised that they were temporary and would be removed after the war. The wartime excess-profits tax has been repealed, and the high wartime individual and corporate income-tax rates have been reduced. Excise-tax payers are the only category who have had no relief from the high wartime rates. Since the Senate Finance Committee has favorably recommended these reductions, I very earnestly believe that the Senate should approve my amendment.

The amendment is offered on behalf of myself and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

CONSULAR CONVENTION RELATING TO NONAPPLICATION OF CONVENTION TO NEWFOUNDLAND—REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate remove the ban of secrecy with regard to the consular convention relating to the nonapplication of the convention to Newfoundland and Newfoundland citizens, Executive A, Eighty-first Congress, second session, which was sent to the Senate today.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the ban of secrecy is removed from the convention, and the convention, together with the President's message of transmittal, will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and the President's message will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The President's message is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith the consular convention, with an accompanying protocol of signature, between the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, signed at Washington on February 16, 1949, and an exchange of notes dated October 12, 1949, relating to the nonapplication of the convention to Newfoundland and Newfoundland citizens.

I transmit also, for the information of the Senate, the report by the Secretary of State with respect to the convention.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

PROTOCOL AMENDING INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT FOR SUPPRESSION OF WHITE SLAVE TRAFFIC—REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate remove the ban of secrecy with regard to the protocol amending the international agreement for the suppression of the white slave traffic, Executive B, Eighty-first Congress, second session, which was sent to the Senate today.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the ban of secrecy is removed from the protocol, and the protocol, together with the President's message of transmittal, will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and the President's message will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The President's message is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith a certified copy of a protocol amending the international agreement for the suppression of the white slave traffic signed at Paris on May 18, 1904, and the international convention for the suppression of the white slave traffic signed at Paris on May 4, 1910.

The protocol was opened for signature at Lake Success, N. Y., on May 4, 1949, and was signed on behalf of the United States of America on that date. Its object is the transfer to the United Nations of the functions exercised by the French Government under the 1904 agreement and 1910 convention.

I also transmit herewith, for the information of the Senate, the report of the Secretary of State regarding the protocol, and a copy, in English translation, of the annex to the protocol.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

PROTOCOL AMENDING AGREEMENT FOR SUPPRESSION OF CIRCULATION OF OBSCENE PUBLICATIONS—REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate remove the ban of secrecy with regard to the protocol amending the agreement for the suppression of the circulation of obscene publications, Executive C, Eighty-first Congress, second session, which was sent to the Senate today.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the ban of secrecy is removed from the protocol, and the protocol, together with the President's message of transmittal, will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and the President's message will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The President's message is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith a certified copy of a protocol amending the agreement for the suppression of the circulation of obscene publications signed at Paris on May 4, 1910.

The protocol was opened for signature at Lake Success, N. Y., on May 4, 1949, and was signed on behalf of the United States of America on that date. Its object is the transfer to the United Nations of the functions exercised by the French Government under the agreement of May 4, 1910.

I also transmit herewith, for the information of the Senate, the report of the Secretary of State regarding the protocol, and a copy, in English translation, of the annex to the protocol.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY IN THE FAR EAST

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I desire to take this occasion to report personally to my colleagues on my recent trip to the Far East and to make certain observations on conditions as I found them there and certain recommendations for consideration in the development of a sound far-eastern foreign policy. I am aware there are some matters I shall bring up that may be controversial, and my colleagues may wish to interrupt. I am going to request that I not be interrupted until after I have finished my address, at which time I shall be more than happy to answer questions of my colleagues.

My distinguished colleague the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] made a memorable address on the floor of the Senate last Thursday, in which he reviewed in some detail the developments leading up to the present debacle in China and pointed out what seemed to him, and I may add to a number of other Members of the Senate, to be the mistakes of policy, or, perhaps better stated, the lack of policy, of the administration in the far-eastern situation.

While I have been one of the severe critics of the administration on far-eastern policy, it is not my purpose in my remarks today to take the critical side, except, incidentally, as it may be relevant in making my points in my effort to develop a positive program. At the moment I am not interested in the answer to the question as to who has been wrong in this controversy, but I am profoundly interested in what may be the right answer to the legitimate question pressing us on all sides as to our future course and policy in the Far East if we are to stop the creeping paralysis of communism in that area.

It was because of my complete feeling of frustration after studying the China white paper, and after discovering the wide divergence of opinion among experts whom I had consulted, that I felt the urge, as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, to go in person as soon as possible to the area affected and to get the "feel" of the situation on the ground. With the unanimous consent of the Senate, which I asked for and received on September 9, I made my plans to go to Japan first, after checking with General MacArthur and receiving his invitation to come. Mrs. Smith and I visited Japan, Okinawa, the Philippines, Hong Hong, Korea, Formosa, and on our flight home the island of Guam, the trusteed islands in the Pacific, and the Hawaiian Islands.

During this trip we interviewed many people, including the United States high command—military, naval, and air; our State Department officials—Ambassadors, consuls, and their staffs; native Japanese, Filipinos, Chinese, Koreans, and the inhabitants of the various islands. We also had the privilege of interviewing many Americans and British who for years have been living in these areas.

Immediately upon my return, which was about the end of October, and before I had had time to prepare my report to my committee in detail, I endeavored to contact the Secretary of State, Mr. Acheson, in order to make my recommendations directly to him. Of course, as we know, he at that time was about to start for his important conferences in Paris, and although he could not see me, he expressed interest in my trip, and at his suggestion I sent him a preliminary memorandum in the form of a letter to take with him on his journey to Paris, which contained two vitally important recommendations which I felt I should make immediately to the Department of State and to my committee.

That letter is dated November 4. I again want to emphasize the date. It was the first communication I made to anybody on the subject of my trip. I ask unanimous consent that this first communication to the Secretary of State after my return be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOVEMBER 4, 1949.

HON. DEAN ACHESON,
Secretary of State,
Department of State,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR DEAN: I had hoped to see you before this to have a chance to talk to you personally about my experience in the Far East. I see by the papers this morning that you may be called suddenly to Paris for a conference with the British and French on policies generally, and therefore the chances of my seeing you before you return do not appear to be too bright. I realize the pressure you are under and want to send you my very best wishes as you undertake these important deliberations.

There are just two matters I wanted particularly to emphasize in my talk with you and I can state them in this letter, with the hope that I can elaborate my reasons at a later date:

1. I am strongly of the conviction that under no conditions should we recognize the Chinese Communist government at this time, and furthermore I hope it will be possible for you with your eloquence and diplomacy to persuade the British not to do so. Whether or not it ultimately has to be done remains to be seen, but I think it would be tragically fatal at the moment. From my talks with the British authorities in Hong Kong, I was convinced that they were thinking exclusively in terms of (a) defense of Hong Kong, or at any cost retaining it in British possession, and (b) the pressure of their commercial interests in Shanghai and Hong Kong to recognize the Commies, so that traditional British trade can go on as before.

I was also impressed, however, with the argument from the British that they felt whatever stand was taken should be taken with the United States and not apart from the United States. I feel, therefore, that our strong stand against recognition would have a weighty effect upon the British position. In any event, however, I urge that we do not make the mistake, as I see it, of recognizing the Chinese Communist government at this time. Many things can happen in the next few months.

2. The second important conviction that came to me from my trip was that under no conditions should we let Formosa fall into the hands of the Chinese Communists or under the domination of Russia. This, of course, presents a very difficult question, and it is problematical whether the Nationalist Government could defend Formosa without further aid from us. From the standpoint of our own national security, however, I was convinced from my visit on the ground and getting the feel of our strategical island bases that the occupation of Formosa by hostile forces would definitely threaten our security. I did not arrive at this conclusion from any strategical knowledge of my own, which I make no claim to, but from the insistence of our military and naval forces wherever I went that this was a very dangerous issue and that we could not afford to pass it up.

Without raising the question of whether or not we should back up the Nationalist forces in their defense, the feeling seems to be among many of our people in Japan and in other places that in light of the fact that the peace treaty has not as yet been signed with Japan, Formosa today is technically part of Japan, even though because of the Cairo agreement we permitted the Nationalists to take it over. If we can still take the position that technically it is part of Japan, and that as we are occupying Japan we have a responsibility for all Japanese possessions, we could, I believe, perfectly consistently take it over by our occupancy, with notice to the UN that it might be made a trusteeship area. This should be done in collaboration with the Nationalist Government that is there and with the Taiwan people themselves, who I believe would be anxious to have us take such a step. If this were done, the Chinese Communists would be faced with the responsibility of attacking the United States if they attacked Formosa under these conditions.

I am sending you this line at this time because of your contemplated trip to Europe, and as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate, who feels he has a personal responsibility to express to our representative his convictions on these important points. I am working now on a more complete report to my committee, based on my observations, and to you as Secretary of State.

With kindest personal regards and assurances to you of my eagerness to work these problems out on a completely cooperative basis, having in mind the legislative as well as the executive responsibilities of all of us, I remain,

Always cordially yours,

H. ALEXANDER SMITH,
United States Senator.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. In this letter I made two points which I shall develop later—first, the importance of nonrecognition of Communist China and of efforts to prevail on the British to join us in that course; and second, the strategic importance of preventing Communist seizure of Formosa.

Shortly thereafter the discussion of the far-eastern situation became very prominent in the public press. In light of the special interest that had arisen with regard to the Formosa problem especially, I wrote to the Secretary of State, Mr. Acheson, under date of December 27—and I again emphasize the date, December 27—submitting to him some further suggestions. These will appear later in this address.

Mr. President, at this point I desire to comment on certain parts of the report which I made to the Foreign Relations Committee, and copies of which went to the Secretary of State and others in the State Department concerned with far-eastern affairs. I ask unanimous consent that there appear in the RECORD at the conclusion of my address the full text of this report with the letter of transmittal in order that the RECORD may be complete.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. In part II of the report, namely, Comments on Specific Areas, I made a brief summary of those areas covered by the trip other than China and its problems; particularly, I discussed briefly the situation in Japan, where it will be noted my report is very positive and very optimistic, and particularly points out the magnificent work which has been done by the American occupation under the brilliant leadership of General MacArthur.

Part III of my report was a separate treatment of the problem of China. Here I was dealing with the real purpose of my trip, and, as I pointed out in my report, we were handicapped because of the difficulty and practical impossibility of getting inside China. General MacArthur came to our rescue by making it possible for us to go to Hong Kong, and later to Formosa, where we did have a first-hand opportunity of studying some of the difficult problems involved in those areas. Everywhere we went in the Far East, China was a primary subject of discussion. People with whom I talked were divided into two main groups; first, those who follow the general line of our United States policy and look upon the Nationalist cause as completely "washed up"; second, those who are sharply critical of the United States policy and feel we are largely to blame for the let-down of morale of the Nationalists and who feel there is still salvage in the existing situation, desperate though it is.

As I stated in my opening remarks, it is not my purpose to seek to place blame. What I am seeking to do is to find, if possible, some formula for the future and see if there is any salvage in the existing Chinese situation.

It was my privilege in my visits to Hong Kong and Formosa to talk with many American-trained Chinese who have the vision of our western Christian tradition, and who, I believe, would sincerely make any personal sacrifice to save China from the dangers that now threaten her. I had the privilege of conferring at some length with Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, who in spite of all the mistakes he has admittedly made in dealing with this situation, is nevertheless, in my judgment, one of the most important figures World War II produced, and who may still have much to contribute to the salvation of his country. In my conference with him—and I want to emphasize this—I purposely avoided discussion of any further military assistance. I made it as clear as I could that I was not thinking in military terms so that there could be no possible implication that further military aid might be forthcoming. I knew the feeling of the administration on that subject, and I did not want to be put in the position of seeming to be promising any military aid. This was not because I did not hope we might decide to give them further military aid for the defense of Formosa, but because I wanted to highlight my own conviction that there was another approach to the Chinese problems from the ideological side which had been too much neglected. What I did stress, therefore, was that the Nationalist Government had not offered the Chinese people any program of reform and rehabilitation which could compete adequately with the Russian-inspired Communist promises. We pointed out that even on the island of Formosa which had been Japanese territory, the Nationalists, when they took over, could have made the island an ideal Chinese province with all the reforms that the Chinese people were yearning for. Unfortunately, the island has had Nationalist governors who had the purely militaristic point of view, and who unfortunately treated the Formosan people not as liberated Chinese, but as a conquered population.

When I was in Formosa an eminent and high-minded Chinese was governor, namely, Gen. Chen Cheng. My criticisms are not aimed at him, because he was seeking reforms in that area about which complaints had been made. I was convinced from my talks with him that he saw the need of the reforms which we had been discussing, and in fact had taken some steps to put them into effect. He was a military man, however, and unfortunately the atmosphere of militarism was resented by the people. Since that time Gen. Chen Cheng has been put in command of a part of the Nationalist forces elsewhere, and Mr. K. C. Wu, an American-trained civilian Chinese, has been made governor of the island.

I had personally known of Mr. K. C. Wu prior to my trip to China, because he was educated at Princeton, with which I have been connected, and took a Ph. D. degree there. I can say from my knowledge of Ph. D. degrees that that was an accomplishment for a foreigner. He had the reputation of being a brilliant student and a man of the highest integrity. During my stay in Formosa I had very important talks with Mr. Wu. I was convinced of his ability and his vision, and it was he who explained best to me some of the problems which had handicapped the Generalissimo in his administrative duties.

To sum up the situation as I saw it there, the morale and leadership and the strength of the Nationalist Government, which was the foundation of Chiang Kai-shek's brilliant leadership in the war against Japan, has collapsed because of military mistakes and internal jealousies. It has also collapsed because of the thread of misunderstanding and, I regret to say, the ineptness on the part of our Government which runs through the whole post VJ-day story. My own judgment is that we did not thoroughly understand the Chinese psychology.

Let me add here that from my personal contacts and my knowledge over a number of years of some of these Chinese individuals, I am prepared to deny the unfortunate propaganda that all Chinese in the Nationalist ranks are corrupt. Of course there is some corruption in China, as there is in other parts of the world. But many of the fine Chinese we met still stand by the Nationalist cause and have been struggling hard to reform the Nationalist leadership.

I have gone at some length into this phase of the situation in China because I wish to emphasize that we have overlooked a far more important factor than mere military aid. That factor is what might be called the psychological or ideological factor which could have meant support and backing for those high-minded Chinese whom we well knew and who were seeking reform and who should never have been given the discouragement that came from the feeling that their old traditional friend, the United States, had abandoned them in their time of greatest crisis.

After I had discussed in my report the problem of China, I took up part IV, which I called over-all observations, and under this head I made seven points.

My first observation was the yearning among all peoples in the far-eastern areas to express their own nationalism and to be free from external controls. That is literally in the air. This yearning for freedom and self-expression was so strong that it must inevitably impress any visitor, even for a short time. It certainly exists in Japan where General MacArthur has recognized it and is trying to give it expression. It certainly exists in the Philippines, where in spite of gratitude to the United States there is rejoicing over freedom and independence. It certainly exists in Korea where the South Koreans are ready to die in order to preserve the freedom they have won, and it certainly exists in Formosa where the natives are demanding freedom and are even suggesting that they might set up an independent state protected from the Communists on the one hand and not left under the subjection of the Nationalists on the other hand.

I wish to express the view at this point that there are Formosans who are between the two forces. We have been speaking in terms of those who are in this picture, and who are innocent bystanders and onlookers in the holocaust that is going on.

My second observation was that the people in the Far East were yearning for economic reform and rehabilitation. There are distinct protests in the air against old-fashioned colonialism on the one hand, and totalitarian controls on the other. The Chinese Communist movement is fooling the people by false promises of freedom and reform. Unfortunately we of the western democracies have failed adequately to explain and interpret the foundations of true liberty which are deeply spiritual in their nature and which through a thousand years of "sweet, blood and tears" have made possible the building of a great country such as the United States.

My third observation was that we Americans are not sufficiently Far-East minded. We come from European stock and therefore because of our ancestral influences, we think in terms of the problems of Europe rather than the problems of the Orient. Those who are representing us in the Far East, whether in the defense groups or in the State Department groups, all indicated to me a sense of loneliness in that the problems of Europe were being highlighted and the problems of the Far East were being neglected. They felt that the men on the ground who were in daily contact with these problems were not being considered, but that questions of policy were being decided in Washington, 10,000 miles away, by some who had never even been to the Far East, or who certainly had not been there recently.

My fourth observation was that our representatives in the Far East were handicapped in the handling of problems because we appear to be dealing with those problems in compartments rather than as one composite whole. General MacArthur and the Army have general jurisdiction over our island defenses running from Alaska through Japan, Okinawa, and the Philippines, but have nothing whatever to do with the mainland of Asia. The mainland of Asia is under the jurisdiction of our Navy, and while I have never seen anywhere better cooperation between our Army and Navy than in this area, everyone with whom I talked, both Army and Navy men, admitted there should be a unification of authority in the entire area and that an over-all ideological as well as purely military approach to the problems was necessary if we are to meet the challenge that communism is making. Unfortunately, our policy of "letting the dust settle" completely ignores this ideological approach. I came away with a strong conviction that there should be some one guiding hand covering all these far-eastern problems, either in the form of an individual or in the form of a closely coordinated group. Certainly from the military and general strategical point of view, the fact that there is no one finger on the pulse of all these problems is a critical weakness.

We are going to have to consider not only China, but Burma, and Indochina, and Siam, and Korea, and the new Indonesian Republic, and so forth. There is no one finger on the pulse of events in the Far East. When I say "one finger," I do not necessarily mean one man, but one man or a coordinated group.

My fifth observation was with regard to the military situation with which we are all familiar and the collapse of the Nationalist armies. It might be noted here that this situation in China is paralleled by threatened situations in other far-eastern areas to which we must give our immediate attention. When I say "immediate," I wish to emphasize that word. Time is passing very rapidly, and we have no policy.

My sixth observation had to do with the morale factor. In talking with people whose views represent both sides of the Chiang Kai-shek controversy, I came to the conclusion that there was a tendency to think the alternative to further military aid to the Nationalist Government was the abandonment of China entirely, that there must be military aid or nothing, that when one makes an argument against military aid, his conclusion is abandonment. In talking with prominent Chinese who I found had ideals for China other than mere military victory for the Nationalist Government, I sensed a feeling of despair because of their abandonment by the United States in this crisis in their history. Since the days of the Boxer indemnity scholarships, the "open door" and our strong stand for China's territorial integrity, advanced Chinese thinkers have looked to the United States for leadership in the areas of educational and spiritual advancement.

These Chinese leaders with whom I had many conversations, and whom I characterize as advanced thinkers on Chinese problems, have emphasized to me that as serious as the loss of our military support was, it was even more serious to the Chinese people to lose those morale-building factors which Americans and American-trained Chinese had contributed. It seemed to me as I talked with these people as though in our dealings with the Chinese during the past few years that we have underestimated this distinction between morale-building factors and mere military might.

Finally among my observations, my point 7 had an optimistic touch and expressed a hope for the future. I suggested that the morale factor which I had discussed with these Chinese leaders and which is very hard to define and lay our hands on in a practical way, offers us a latent salvage in the situation which we cannot afford to neglect. We must find some way to salvage these Chinese leaders, who, to my mind, are the hope of the future of China, and who today are primarily identified with the Nationalist cause. I talked with them in Hong Kong, Formosa, and have talked to them in New York and elsewhere in America. Figuratively speaking, these men are holding out their hands to us with a plea to continue to believe in their basic objectives and help them maintain their courage against the tremendous odds of military defeat. These are the real standard bearers against the creeping paralysis of Russian-inspired communism. These individuals might well be described as oases in the vast desert of China, and I have no doubt that throughout the entire "curtain" area there are those who would rally to a courageous ideological approach aimed at Chinese rehabilitation.

The fact must be faced that the conquest of China has been, first of all, an ideological penetration. Twenty-five years ago men were being prepared in Sun Yat-sen's university in Moscow for this strategy. They stole the Sun Yat-sen name at that time and gave it to a university in Moscow, and took these young men over there. And they succeeded in their design. The military phase was important, but the winning of Chinese to the philosophy of communism came first. We in this country are slow to understand that we live in an ideological age. And we have been slow to realize that this is a cold war for men's minds. We try to meet that ideological penetration with economic aid and with "business as usual." We have sent educators and missionaries, but as a nation we must face the tragic result that the ideas of Marx and Lenin have taken over this vast territory and that the Christian heart of our democratic faith, the spirit that has brought us liberty in political form after thousands of years of struggle will be slowly strangled in the life of China. If we recognize this tragic fact, we shall begin to create a new kind of strategy. We shall fight to insure that along with economic and military strength, we are ideologically prepared.

In his press conference, as it appears in the New York Times of Friday, January 6, the Secretary of State in supporting the President's "hands off Formosa" policy is quoted as saying:

> It is not the function of the United States, nor will it nor can it attempt, to furnish a will to resist and a purpose for resistance for those who must provide for themselves. That is the background of this statement.

Mr. President, I cannot describe how shocked I was when I read that; but it made me understand the point of view that brought us to where we are.

I do not wish to quote the Secretary of State out of his context, but it seems to me that such a conclusion lays us open to the charge of bankruptcy of policy. If America cannot provide the motive and impulse that will enable the free peoples of the world to fight for democracy, how can we possibly expect material means to do the job alone? How can we expect mere dollars to solve this problem? How can we expect it to be solved unless something more than dollars is used?

Regardless of our economic, political, and military policies for the Orient, the key to the democratic future of the Far East lies in this field, the training of a truly democratic leadership now, much as Moscow started to train Communist leadership from China and far-eastern countries years ago. Moscow simply outwitted us. Moscow simply moved first, and now we are the victims.

After making the foregoing observations, which in a slightly different form appear in my report to the committee, I made certain immediate specific recommendations which appear in part V of the report, and in making those recommendations I said I was pleading for an attitude of mind by us which will give hope and courage to those who are still willing to remain faithful to what they believe in. Frankly, it is the attitude of mind that I found in discussing this matter with some of our leaders in the State Department which has given me discouragement, and this sense of frustration. The administration's attitude seems to be that we cannot think of aid of any kind because it might mix us up in the so-called Chinese civil war. Yet, we have examples of extending aid which might mix us up. I am thinking of the Atlantic Pact countries, and our recent set-up there; I am thinking of our policy affecting Greece and Turkey; yet when it comes to the Far East it is contended we will become mixed up in war if we give any kind of aid.

This attitude seems to exclude our full participation in the kind of ideological approach through an understanding with these high-minded Chinese leaders which alone can bring an ultimate recovery of China. There are so many instances in history where the spirit of the people, even without powerful backing has saved situations that I do not need to elaborate here more on this particular matter. We need only to think of Valley Forge in our own history and Dunkerque in recent British history, as my distinguished colleague from California pointed out last Thursday, to realize the possibilities in the spirit and courage of human beings. Irrespective of what the situation is in the Far East, irrespective of all other considerations with regard to our Chinese policy, I urge with all the force at my command that we seek and find a formula to preserve what I truly believe today is alive in China—this courageous spiritual heritage.

In my conclusion, after my recommendations, I emphasized particularly that the United States of America in its foreign policy must not let down the small and weak nations of the Far East in their yearning for self-expression and nationalism, and especially their yearning for freedom from dictatorial controls. Certainly we cannot stand by and see them released from the old type of colonialism and then sold into the slavery of the new totalitarian, atheistic communism.

Now, Mr. President and Members of the Senate, I shall proceed to a discussion of the most urgent question facing us today, namely, the action which should be taken with respect to the remaining core of Nationalist resistance about which I have been talking, whose vital center is Formosa. I am going to examine the Formosan problem.

Before I examine the alternatives before us, as I see them, let me restate certain points which I developed in my report of December 1.

First. We need a single coordinated far-eastern policy. Therefore, our action with respect to Formosa must fit in with our whole military and political position in the Far East.

Second. From the strategic standpoint, we have ample expert testimony that the passing of Formosa into Communist hands would seriously weaken our whole position in the Pacific. That, of course, is one of the great controversial issues to which I shall refer again in a moment.

Third. From the political and ideological standpoint, American recognition of the Chinese Communists, whose conquest of China is a major element in Soviet world strategy, would deal a heavy blow to the cause of freedom throughout the Far East. To oppose this Communist movement it is vital not only that we should refuse recognition to the Mao Tze-tung regime, but also that a strong center of free Chinese survival should be maintained somewhere.

In the light of these points, let me review our possible alternatives of action in Formosa.

First. The first and easiest course is hands off—which means handing Formosa to the Communists. That is inevitable if we keep hands off. This is the course the President intends to pursue, according to his announcement of January 5. Without in anyway questioning his sincerity or that of his advisers, I suggest that this decision, taken, unfortunately without consulting with Members of the Congress, who are deeply concerned with this question, is no policy at all but an admission of defeat. It means abandoning hope for a free China in this generation. If it remains our policy, the cause of freedom everywhere will suffer immeasurable damage, and the security of American defenses in the Pacific will receive a heavy blow. This is the course of despair, and, personally, I reject it utterly.

Second. A second alternative would be for the United States to seek a United Nations trusteeship over Formosa, or a joint trusteeship with the Chinese Nationalists, to continue until the precise status of the island is settled by the peace treaty with Japan. This peaceful and constructive approach would be important to explore if it were feasible, but obviously any such proposal would be defeated by a Russian veto. Although I believe we should keep the United Nations informed of any steps we take with respect to Formosa, it is clear that we cannot possibly work effectively through the United Nations at this time.

Third. A third alternative was very ably presented in the remarks of the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] last Thursday. In essence, he suggests that we send the Nationalists on Formosa and Hainan both ECA aid, from some $106,000,000 which remains available, and military aid to bolster their defenses, from the President's $75,000,000 discretionary flexible fund and from surplus military equipment available in this country. The Senator from California further suggests that the military assistance be effectively supervised by an able American military mission.

These were among the eight recommendations of the Senator from California, who is interested, as I am, in an active American policy now in support of Chinese freedom. Unfortunately, it seems clear from the remarks of the President and the Secretary of State last Thursday that these recommendations will not be carried out. Therefore, it behooves us if possible to seek another alternative.

I may say that was entirely in support of the Senator from California in his suggestions, in spite of the difficulties that appeared, but I feel the suggestion I am going to make now may be an alternative which we might all consider carefully, and approach with the spirit of seeing whether it cannot be made effective.

In seeking to formulate such an alternative, I have had constantly in mind my belief, already reiterated, that an exaggerated emphasis on the military aspects of the China situation has led us—and the Nationalist Government too—into a neglect of the all-important economic, political, and ideological aspects. I may say that in my view the Nationalist neglect of political, economic, and ideological opportunities, as I discussed them with Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, in particular their failure to do anything effective in the realms of political democracy and land reform, enormously eased the path of Communist victory in China.

Fortunately, as I have noted, there has recently been in Formosa a considerable change in the prevailing attitude toward this matter of reform. Important steps have been taken to liberalize the administration of the island and to give the Taiwanese people a larger voice in their affairs. Steps are being taken with ECA cooperation to improve the economy of the island. I agree emphatically with the Senator from California that those economic steps should continue with our strong support. It appears that this ECA aid will continue with the President's approval. I wish to emphasize that point because the very last sentence of his statement the other day, which appeared to wipe off Formosa, did leave the ECA road open.

These economic and political trends in Formosa deserve the strongest support we can give them. In my approach to this subject I am seeking to emphasize them and to subordinate the military aspects of our commitment in Formosa as much as it is possible to do so. I have two reasons for this.

First, it seems clear to me that we cannot expect any great economic or political progress on Formosa so long as the overriding preoccupation is with military preparation and military operation. It is my hope, as I shall explain in a moment, that with American support Formosa can become a truly democratic going concern—a testing ground of free Chinese democracy. I think Senators will generally agree with me that Formosa cannot move far in that direction and at the same time be maintained as an armed camp. The two descriptions are to a large extent mutually exclusive; we must choose one or the other, certainly, for our main emphasis.

My second reason is even more persuasive, because it touches directly the security of the American people. My able colleague, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] stated my concern very clearly—the concern of all of us, I know—when last Thursday in this Chamber he asked this question:

> Are we then not running a serious danger, if our intervention takes even the form of military advisers or the supplying of war matériel, of an open conflict with the Chinese Communists over Formosa, a conflict which might be interpreted as an act of war on our part?

To this the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] replied that he did not think so, but that certainly no prudent man would say that was not a possibility to be reckoned with.

I myself think that open war between ourselves and the Chinese Communists, leading possibly to a wider and still more terrible conflict, would be a distinct possibility if we committed ourselves in an unlimited military way to the Nationalist cause in Formosa. And that would be a tragedy to which none of us would wish to expose the United States.

Fourth. That is why I have taken it upon myself to try and seek still another alternative of action in Formosa. It should be a course which the President could accept in the light of his statement of last Thursday barring direct military aid to the Nationalists in their prosecution of the war from Formosa. It should be a course of action which is predominantly peaceful and constructive. It should demonstrate for all the peoples of the Far East the true nature of American aims in the world—our desire to promote peace, personal freedom, democracy, and economic well-being. I realize fully the difficulties imposed by the imminence of Communist assault on Formosa. But I desire in all seriousness to share with my colleagues in the Senate my thoughts on this matter, so far as they have developed.

My first suggestion along this line was made in a letter which I sent to the Secretary of State on December 27, 1949. That was quite a number of days before the President's decision. I ask unanimous consent to have this letter in full inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPARKMAN in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

DECEMBER 27, 1949.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Following up my previous suggestion to you and the recommendation made in my report to the foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate, I desire to submit some further suggestions with regard to the Formosan situation.

In light of the fact that the United Nations by resolution in which the United States joined, referred the matter of the Nationalist complaint against Russia to the Little Assembly, I assume that recognition of the Chinese Communist Government by the United States will be postponed for the present.

Since the Nationalist Government is now headquartered on the island of Formosa, we have a situation that demands the immediate attention not only of the United States but also of the United Nations.

The following factors seem to me necessary for consideration in this matter:

A. Understanding was given to the Nationalist Government of China at the Cairo Conference that Formosa would be returned to China in the eventual settlement of the peace with Japan;

B. The Chinese Communists have conquered practically the entire Chinese mainland and can be expected to demand that Formosa be turned over to them, with threat of military aggression if the demand is not complied with;

C. From a strategic standpoint Formosa must not be allowed to fall into hands that are hostile to the United States, since such an occupation would seriously threaten our island defense line running from Japan south through the Okinawa group and through the Philippines;

D. Since the Japanese peace treaty has not as yet been signed, Formosa is still legally a part of Japan where the United States, representing the conquerors of Japan are now in occupation.

With these factors in mind I respectfully suggest the following procedure:

I. The United States should immediately engage in informal conversations with Mr. K. C. Wu, the new Governor of Formosa, with the purpose of arranging for the occupation of the island by the United States. Since the United States, representing the conquerors of Japan, is now in occupation of Japan the logic of the situation would seem to suggest that the United States should also be in friendly and peaceful occupation of Formosa until such time as the ultimate sovereignty of the island is determined. Inasmuch as the Chinese Nationalist Government was our ally in the last war and is still recognized as the legitimate government of China, we might consider a joint occupation pending the conclusion of the Japanese peace treaty.

II. The United States should explore with the Nationalist Government the possibility during the occupation of either (a) the suspension of aggressive hostilities against the Communists, including the blockade, or (b) carrying on such activity from some base other than Formosa, such as Hainan. The success of any further aggressive action on the part of the Nationalist Government appears extremely doubtful and the Nationalist Government might welcome the opportunity for the temporary cessation of hostilities during the period of this occupation. The Nationalist Government would be supported by the United States if necessary against aggression by any outside force, but it should preferably not be used during the period of occupation as a base for aggressive operations against the Communists on the mainland.

III. The period of occupation of Formosa by the United States alone or jointly with the Nationalist Government should envisage the establishment of a form of democratic government participated in by the Formosan people themselves, and the building up of a democratic and socially just economy. From my conversations with Mr. Wu when I was in Formosa last October, I am convinced that he is one of those Chinese Nationalist leaders who has been advocating a reform and rehabilitation program for the Chinese people and who feels that on the island of Formosa such a program could be put into effect with the cooperation of the Formosan people themselves. Such a development would contemplate the ultimate economic self-sufficiency of the island. Our own ECA funds have already been used in initiating such a development, and I note in the papers that our ECA officials on Formosa after consultation with Mr. Wu, are recommending the use of additional ECA funds on the island.

Such a development in Formosa might well become a pattern of reform and reconstruction for the provinces on the Chinese mainland, if and when that territory is eventually liberated.

IV. A full report of this action, if taken, should be made to the United Nations, stating that our purpose is to maintain the peace until the ultimate sovereignty of the island can be determined.

The course suggested seems to me to be the sound approach to this difficult problem, having in mind the best interests of the existing Government of Formosa, the Formosan people themselves, and the strategical importance of the island as far as the interests of the United States are concerned.

Always cordially yours,

H. ALEXANDER SMITH.

Hon. DEAN ACHESON,
Secretary of State,
Department of State,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Let me repeat here the four recommendations I made in that letter, without reading the entire letter:

I. The United States should immediately engage in informal conversations with Mr. K. C. Wu, the new Governor of Formosa, with the purpose of arranging for the occupation of the island by the United States. Since the United States, representing the conquerors of Japan, is now in occupation of Japan the logic of the situation would seem to suggest that the United States should also be in friendly and peaceful occupation of Formosa until such time as the ultimate sovereignty of the island is determined. Inasmuch as the Chinese Nationalist Government was our ally in the last war and is still recognized by us as the legitimate government of China, we might consider a joint occupation pending the conclusion of the Japanese peace treaty.

That was the first point I made in my letter of December 27 to the Secretary of State.

Here I wish to make it clear, Mr. President, that by the word "occupation" I do not mean to imply the sending of American troops to Formosa, but simply the establishment of a joint political authority and responsibility there between ourselves, the Nationalists, and the Formosan people. I do not think it is necessary to send one soldier there. I think this matter can be approached from the other angle.

My letter continues with the second point, and this I wish to emphasize:

II. The United States should explore with the Nationalist Government the possibility during the occupation—

By occupation, I mean the period until the peace treaty is settled and the final disposition of the island can be determined—of either (a) the suspension of aggressive hostilities against the Communists, including the blockade, or (b) carrying on such activity from some base other than Formosa, such as Hainan. The success of any further aggressive military action on the part of the Nationalist Government appears extremely doubtful and the Nationalist Government might welcome the opportunity for the temporary cessation of hostilities during the period of this occupation. The Nationalist Government would be supported by the United States if necessary against aggression by any outside force, but Formosa should preferably not be used during the period of occupation as a base for aggressive operations against the Communists on the mainland.

III. The period of occupation of Formosa by the United States alone or jointly with the Nationalist Government should envisage the establishment of a form of democratic government participated in by the Formosan people themselves, and the building up of a democratic and socially just economy. From my conversations with Mr. Wu when I was in Formosa last October, I am convinced that he is one of those Chinese Nationalist leaders who has been advocating a reform and rehabilitation program for the Chinese people and who feels that on the island of Formosa such a program could be put into effect with the cooperation of the Formosan people themselves. Such a development would contemplate the ultimate economic self-sufficiency of the island. Our own ECA funds have already been used in initiating such a development, and I note in the papers that our ECA officials on Formosa after consultation with Mr. Wu are recommending the use of additional ECA funds on the island.

And, of course, the President in his recent statement expressed apparently his desire to go ahead with ECA funds on the island.

Such a development in Formosa might well become a pattern of reform and reconstruction for the provinces on the Chinese mainland, if and when that territory is eventually liberated.

My fourth recommendation in my letter to Secretary Acheson was this:

IV. A full report of this action, if taken, should be made to the United Nations, stating that our purpose is to maintain the peace until the ultimate sovereignty of the island can be determined.

That, of course, is the most difficult one in the approach which I tried to develop in my letter to Secretary Acheson.

Let me expand on the second point in this approach which I tried to develop in my letter to Secretary Acheson, that—

II. The United States should explore with the Nationalist Government the possibility during the occupation of either (a) the suspension of aggressive hostilities against the Communists, including the blockade, or (b) carry on such activity from some base other than Formosa, such as Hainan—

Or some of the other islands they have been using for their aggressive activities.

My purpose in proposing such a policy is twofold: to avoid the antidemocratic and antiprogressive influence of the armed camp on Formosa, so that reasonable hope may be entertained for political and economic progress; and—even more vital from the standpoint of American interests—to avoid the possibility that our intervention in Formosa would draw us into an unlimited military commitment and an eventual shooting match with the Communists and even the Russians.

For this purpose the United States might well go beyond the above suggestion. I believe the United States could and should make the following stipulations, or should at least expore them, as a prior condition of our giving aid to the Formosa regime:

First. All aggressive action against the Communists from Formosa shall cease. Remaining military activity on Formosa shall be restricted entirely to a defensive state of readiness against the possibility of Communist assault on the island from the mainland.

Second. Formosa shall be governed by a regime jointly agreed upon by the Chinese Nationalists and by representatives of the native population. The policy of this regime shall be to develop the economy of the island for the benefit of the population, and to establish firmly the institutions and practices of democratic self-government.

I ask my colleagues to note this point, because this is one, of course, which has controversial features, but I submit it as a sound approach:

Third. Under its authority as the occupying power in Japan, the United States will supervise the carrying out of these conditions and will guarantee the nonaggressive status of the island. American authority over Formosa will continue, on the terms laid down, until further determination of the island's status under the Japanese peace treaty. All these steps, and the policy underlying them, would be reported by us at once to the United Nations. I am thinking not only of the fact that there are two warring factions in China; but on the island of Formosa there are 7,000,000 natives, natives of Taiwan or Formosa, who would be subject to a slaughterhouse if, for example, an air war should be carried on over that island.

Under such a formula, in my judgment, the United States could still pursue its historic policy of friendship and support for a free Chinese people without assuming a dangerous and unlimited military commitment, and without giving aid and comfort to any Nationalist leaders who may entertain the foolish notion that American aid will help them reconquer China from Formosa by force of arms. I think such a formula, by granting an adequate defense to the Nationalists on Formosa—because that is what we would do—while committing them to forswear any aggressive intentions, would go far to deter the Communists from an invasion attempt. But at that point, we can think in terms of the suggestion by former President Hoover and by our colleague the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], namely, that on the defensive side it might be well or necessary to send a few warships into the area. I am thinking only in terms of defense, and eliminating all possibility of aggressive warfare on the island. If in spite of this the Communists should attempt an invasion, I am sure that American support would inspire the very capable Nationalist forces to give a very good account of themselves. With a change in policy designed to give the Formosan people—that is the natives—a real stake in the peaceful future of the island, any invading Communist army would have to reckon not only with the Nationalist defenders but with the determined resistance of the Taiwan people themselves. I refer to the Taiwan people, with whom I made contact. I am receiving letters from some of them today, wanting us to do something to prevent their being taken over by the Communist regime of China. They are critical of the Nationalist regime, but they want to be taken care of, they want to be protected against the Communists, too.

But in forming a correct policy we must do more than simply consider the avoidance of pitfalls and the avoidance of risks. I do not for a moment deny that risks would be involved in a policy such as I have described. What I maintain is that they are limited risks and that they are worth taking many times over in view of the positive good which would flow from such a step.

While it is true that there are the limited risks, it is essential for us to realize that the alternative risks are far, far greater. Three of these come to mind at once, and these risks we take when we write off China and Formosa, as we have up to date:

First. The extinction of hope for the democratic cause that will spread like a plague through the world if our policy continues to be one of negative reaction. We always hear it said, "No; that cannot be done; that cannot be done." We ask, "What are you going to do?" There is no answer. "Let the dust settle." I should like to point out in this connection especially that this is true of Europe as well as Asia. We are not simply dealing here with the Asiatic problem but with the world problem. What will it mean to the countries of eastern Europe if we have no adequate counterstrategy for the countries of eastern Asia?

Second. The second alternative risk is the lowering of American prestige which will follow such an extinction of hope. And the hope there is. One cannot go into those areas without finding hope. Think of the Koreans. Think of all the people there who are trembling because of what may happen next, since, as they feel, we suppressed the Nationalists. They want to find freedom. They look to the United States to show the way.

Third. The third is the endangering of our own security which in spite of confident pronouncements from the State Department is painfully obvious from a glance at the map. It must deeply concern the mind of the American people that the advice of the men who are chiefly responsible for our victory in the Far East, the men who have lived with the military strategy of that area over a decade, should be discounted in these critical decisions.

Let me enumerate some of the good consequences which I believe would flow from this policy of promoting a peaceful, nonaggressive, democratic Formosa under American and free Chinese auspices.

First. We would effectively protect the line of American strategic defenses in the Pacific.

Second. We would make possible the establishment of a non-Communist Chinese Government which would become a model for all China politically, economically, and socially. It would be a testing ground and show place for the values of true democracy in China. For the people of the mainland it would offer a revealing contrast to the oppressive character of the Communist regime.

Third. We would set up a rallying point for all the Chinese who desire a peaceful and democratic evolution for their country. From my own acquaintance I know how many Chinese leaders there are who have not lost hope for the fulfillment of this ideal. Once enabled to work for democracy without the overwhelming disadvantages of militarism and dictatorial suppression of liberty, these moderate, prodemocratic Chinese could find in the new Formosa a testing ground and workshop for the carrying out of their ideals.

There are many instruments that could be directed to this end. There are thousands of men and women—I am hearing from them all the time—who are looking to America to give to the world a new faith in democracy and a new insight into its moral implication. The opportunities for such training are wide open to us in Formosa through the University of Formosa, through the schools, through films, radio, lecture programs and the setting up of training centers for selected leadership. We would have a new mission for our Voice of America, which needs a new mission so far as the Far East is concerned, a new point of view, to be given from America, of what we are driving at.

Some may question, in view of the record of the government of Chiang Kai-shek on the mainland, whether it is prudent to expect that he will lend himself to any such effort to develop democracy. From my knowledge of his personal career and from the interview I had with him on Formosa, I am convinced that he would gladly join in such a program. Of course, I did not develop this program fully with him; I did not have the opportunity; and I had not gone through it, but his whole attitude was one of sincere interest in the challenge I gave him that the Nationalist Government, or that the leaders in his group had not offered anything to the Chinese people in the way of reform and rehabilitation in competition with the Communists' promises. Away from preoccupation with and demoralization of war, I have strong hope that he will accept the American democratic challenge and exert his leadership to put into effect the principles of democracy and economic construction which he inherited from Sun Yat-sen. I think he feels that is something he would like to have an opportunity to undertake before he is deposed, or before he goes down to defeat.

Fourth. Finally, by adopting this policy toward Formosa, we will give great faith and hope to the non-Communist peoples of the Far East. As I observed in reporting on my travels in that area, the urgent aspirations of all the far-eastern peoples, with whom we will be dealing more and more in the near future, are for national independence, democratic self-government, and economic development. These are goals which they must largely achieve on their own initiative. But the way in which the United States uses its influence and example may well be decisive. It is for us to show the Asiatic peoples that the west does not oppose communism simply for the sake of power or prestige, but opposes communism because we of the west have values that we cherish, values which are essentially the same as theirs, values which communism does not fulfill but on the contrary destroys. A policy of peaceful democratic and economic development in Formosa, under American auspices, would offer a living example of the positive values which we support throughout the world.

A wisely conceived, peaceful American initiative in Formosa would not only be the starting point of a positive policy for China, rallying all those Chinese of good will who believe in the cause of Chinese freedom and democracy. It would not only place a negative barrier against the expansion of world communism into the Pacific. Let me say there that there must be a negative barrier pretty soon or we shall have lost all of Asia. Beyond this, it would stand as a symbol of American policy for all of Asia—a living symbol of our interest in peace, democracy, and material growth.

To me it is vitally important that we achieve not only a positive policy for Asia but a unified policy. Formosa could help greatly in that direction. I believe, as I stated in my earlier report, that we should work for an over-all, unified supervision of American policy in the Far East—a supervision which would embrace all the aspects of our policy, including military strategy, economic strategy, and ideological strategy. I have endeavored to develop my ideas on our proper course in Formosa in the light of this concept of a unified policy.

In conclusion let me emphasize that, reports to the contrary notwithstanding, I never have advocated the forceful seizure of Formosa. Any action that we take there must be with the full cooperation and approval of all concerned. I would be strongly opposed to any policy that might threaten a third world war. I plead for a new approach to this Formosan problem because I see in it an opportunity to turn the tide against communism in Asia and to develop and extend the kind of free government of free nations which we Americans believe in. If a better approach can be developed to this end, I shall support it wholeheartedly. But let us by all means develop an approach which will effectively implement our human values in Asia and throughout the world.

If we continue to hesitate in Asia, if we take the attitude that the cause of a free China is lost and gone in our time, then free men not only in China, not only in Asia, but everywhere will lose their faith in us and in the free life we stand for. The United States today does not have an Atlantic responsibility or a hemispheric responsibility—it has a world responsibility. I urge that we accept this challenge now and that we move.

FAR EASTERN PROBLEMS FACING THE UNITED STATES

(Report of visit to the Far East, September and October 1949, by H. ALEXANDER SMITH, member, Committee on Foreign Relations of United States Senate)

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
November 29, 1949.

To the Chairman and Members of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate:

I am submitting herewith for the consideration of the Foreign Relations Committee and others interested a report of the trip to the Far East which I took with the consent of the Senate, leaving Washington on September 13 last. In this report I have endeavored to indicate the scope of the trip, to present certain over-all observations, and finally to make certain recommendations with regard to our far eastern foreign policy.

I am fully aware of the danger of individuals or groups visiting areas of the world for a short period of time and then claiming to have all the answers. I hope I have avoided this danger.

I do feel, however, as I stated to the committee before I left, that it is vitally important for the members of appropriate committees of the Congress to visit in person the areas in the world where these critical situations have developed. Only by a personal visit can we get the "feel" of a situation and have that independence of judgment which we should have in dealing with the recommendations of policy that come from the Executive.

I sincerely hope that the members of the committee will have the time and opportunity to consider this report.

Always cordially yours,
H. ALEXANDER SMITH.

PART I. REASONS FOR AND SCOPE OF THE TRIP

As I stated on the floor of the Senate in asking consent to take this trip, I felt that the situation in the Far East was so critical that some members of the Foreign Relations and Armed Services Committees should go there as promptly as possible in order to obtain first-hand information which might be of value in dealing with issues of future policy determination.

I am one of those who, since before the close of World War II, has supported our bipartisan foreign policy and has voted for every measure reported to the Senate aimed to bring about the collaboration of the nations of the world to insure the peace. I was an ardent supporter of the United Nations Charter, and have been deeply concerned over its temporary set-back because of the misuse of the veto by Communist-dominated Russia. From the first announcement of the so-called Marshall plan I supported that policy, which was aimed to accomplish the economic recovery and rehabilitation of Europe. During the first years of its operation it has been most effective in halting the creeping paralysis of communism.

For the same reason that I supported the Marshall plan, I have supported the North Atlantic Pact and military implementation of that pact to the end that in the Atlantic area at least we can say, "So far and no farther." We have said clearly to the world that an attack on one of the Atlantic Pact nations would be considered as an attack on all. And we have served notice that the United States will be a participant if there is any breach of the peace in the North Atlantic area. I believe that what we have accomplished this year in setting up the North Atlantic Pact will be another important milestone on the road to world peace.

But at the very moment last summer when this was being accomplished I, as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, felt completely frustrated because it seemed to me that while we were barring our front door (the Atlantic area), the back door (by which I mean the door to the Far East) was being left unlocked. The iron curtain is quietly being lowered over Asia.

It has been a great surprise to me that, while the administration and the Department of State took our Foreign Relations and Armed Services Committees completely into their confidence and collaborated with us in developing both the Marshall plan a year ago and the North Atlantic Pact this year, we have never been consulted about policy in the Far East. In spite of the great concern of many of us over the future of that area we have been practically told there is nothing to do and that we must wait and let nature take its course—or to use another expression, "let the dust settle." The splendid bipartisan approach which characterized the Marshall plan, the Truman doctrines for Greece and Turkey, and the North Atlantic Pact negotiations, has been completely lacking insofar as the Far East is concerned, and those of us who have felt alarmed over this unfortunate situation have been given the feeling that we were unwelcome meddlers in matters of policy that has already been settled. This was why I felt that someone from our committee should go and try to get the facts first hand.

In order to be certain that my trip would not be an embarrassment to anyone on the ground, I wrote to General MacArthur in Tokyo and asked for his judgment on the matter. He not only invited me to come but expressed the hope that every member of the Foreign Relations and Armed Services Committees could come and see first hand what the responsibilities of the United States are in this critical area. Upon my arrival he thanked me personally for coming. He and others with whom I talked pointed out that while we in the United States naturally are more concerned with Europe because our ancestry is practically entirely European, we seem to be neglecting an area of the world that may well be the decisive factor as to whether there will be a world war III.

Our trip was a rapid one. Mrs. Smith accompanied me and through the courtesy of the Department of Defense our travel and hotel accommodations were splendidly taken care of. Everywhere we went I can testify to the fact that in the Far East at least there is a definite and splendid unification of the armed services, and the men in the field who are responsible for the security of the United States cannot be commended too highly for the effective and inspirational discharge of their duties. From the time that we landed in Tokyo we were enabled to cover an enormous amount of territory because of the full cooperation of General MacArthur and his associates in the military, naval, and air forces.

We visited Japan, Okinawa, the Philippines, Hong Kong, Korea, Formosa, and, on our flight home, the island of Guam, the Trusteed Islands in the Pacific, and the Hawaiian Islands. During this trip we interviewed many people including, of course, the United States high command—military, naval, and air, our State Department officials—ambassadors, consuls and their staffs, native Japanese, Filipinos, Chinese, Koreans, and inhabitants of the various islands. We also had the privilege of interviewing many Americans and British who for years have been living in these areas.

PART II. COMMENTS ON SPECIFIC AREAS

While it is the purpose of this report to comment particularly on the situation in China, I desire to sum up briefly my observations on other specific areas.

A. Japan

Of all the areas we visited Japan stands out as a beacon of light and hope in an otherwise alarming picture. No one could be in Japan for even a short period without realizing that an entirely new chapter in the history of the world is being written.

The cold war with Russia has been described as a war of ideologies—the battle for men's minds. That is definitely true as I will comment later in this report. While we in America have been theorizing about it, Russia has won the cold war in China and in other areas up to date. But in Japan General MacArthur and his splendid group of associates are carrying on this war for men's minds and are demonstrating practically what the western Christian tradition is. General MacArthur is not only commander in chief of our military forces in the island areas but is also supreme commander of the allied powers (SCAP). For the first time in history the victor in a great, devastating war has raised the vanquished to their feet and has not only taught them how to recover and take care of themselves, but has contributed to the cost of their recovery. It is too early, of course, to draw any final, definite conclusions, but I would like to emphasize now that this ideological war is being constructively carried on in Japan. A new Japan may well arise to be the spearhead of a revitalized western Christian tradition in the Far East. We have a long way to go before this can be accomplished, and we, of course, face in Japan, as in other parts of the world, the subversive influences of communism, but Japan under MacArthur is moving ahead and in the right direction.

Another aspect of the Japanese situation impressed us. From our interviews with local Japanese, as well as our own Americans who have been in Japan for some years, we were left with a feeling that an opportunity may be presented to the religious and educational workers who have heretofore been interested in Japan to make a real contribution now. It seems to be admitted that, generally speaking, Buddhism is not increasing, and Shintoism, which involves the worn-out idea of emperor worship, is being discarded. This situation leaves a vacuum for those who have what might be called spiritual yearnings, and this vacuum could well now be filled by aggressive, practical, and inspiring Christianity. This would unquestionably be the best bulwark against the further spread of communism. And it is interesting to note in this connection that an aggressive and positive leadership in this matter is being taken by Japanese women. Women in Japan are free for the first time in Japanese history, and their new freedom is releasing the hidden resources of feminine idealism and fundamental spiritual aspirations.

B. Our strategic line of defense—Japan, the Ryukyu Islands, and the Philippines

We had the privilege of traveling by air as the guest of Admiral Turner Joy of our Pacific Fleet from Japan to Okinawa in the Ryukyu group of islands, and to the Philippines. In making this trip and studying our maps we became aware of the critical importance of the line of islands running north and south and making a bastion of defense in the western Pacific to defend the Pacific islands for which we are responsible and our own American mainland. Certainly I would urge that the members of our Armed Services Committees of both House and Senate should visit this area, confer with our Army and Navy leaders and study the relationship of the western Pacific defense to the Formosan problem, which I will discuss later.

C. The Philippines

As we passed through the Philippines on our way to the China area we were conscious of the "growing pains of a new republic." I wish we could have had more time there because here as well as elsewhere the serious threat of communism is present. We were in the Philippines while the election campaign was getting under way, which involved the reelection of President Quirino. I am happy to note in the recent press that President Quirino was reelected by a substantial majority.

President Quirino was strongly pro-American and a supporter of the independent governmental structure which we in America had helped to create, while one of his opponents particularly was violently anti-American and as a matter of fact had been a Japanese quisling in the late war. The result of the election seems to indicate that the Filipino people as a whole desire to be a part of what we call the western tradition, and for the present at least have their faces set against the Communist menace. But it is clear that their economic situation is serious and will be a problem for us for some years ahead.

D. Korea

After our trip to Okinawa, the Philippines, and Hong Kong, we returned to Tokyo where we made our second journey by air through the courtesy of General MacArthur to Korea, Formosa, Guam, and then home. We went to Korea on General MacArthur's special advice in order to see the young, struggling, new republic on the ground.

As a member of the so-called ECA watchdog committee, I felt a special responsibility to visit Korea inasmuch as our Foreign Relations Committee had authorized an ECA appropriation of $150,000,000 for the rehabilitation of Korea's industries. Before I left Tokyo I had conferred with representatives of our Government who had been in Korea and who gave me a very favorable description of what had happened during this last year. These reports were reassuring because on the transport from Seattle to Japan I had been led to believe by those who were familiar with the situation that it might not be possible to save Korea from the Communist wave. The question that was presented, of course, was whether the United States would be justified in investing an additional $150,000,000 in South Korean rehabilitation if there was imminent danger of South Korea being taken over by North Korea, which is under direct Russian control.

In Korea we were welcomed by our Ambassador, Mr. John J. Muccio and Dr. A. C. Bunce, who is in charge of our ECA operations. In conversations with these representatives and their staffs, and additional conferences which we had with President Syngman Rhee, I came to the conclusion that a further ECA investment in Korea is a justifiable calculated risk. During the Japanese control many important industries were started which give promise, if they can be continued, of making Korea an important industrial area. Unfortunately, while the Japanese were in control, Japanese industrial experts held all the higher jobs, so it is necessary for Koreans who are now taking over to have special training to qualify them for executive leadership. This means that the United States has had to furnish technical experts to train the natives to run these plants. A year or so ago this situation looked difficult, and coupled with the threat that Northern Korea, dominated by Russia, might take over the entire peninsula, we took a risk in giving Korea our initial ECA aid. Developments during this past year, however, have justified our confidence. As is well known, the new Korean Republic has been recognized by the United Nations and, therefore, in a sense is under United Nations care as well as United States. The Koreans have developed a well-trained army of their own of some 100,000 men, which army it is believed is thoroughly capable of taking care of Southern Korea in any possible conflict with the north.

I was advised that the Northern Koreans had endeavored to enlist the aid of the Chinese Communists in order to take over and conquer the Southern Koreans, but the Chinese Communists turned them down on the ground that they had too many responsibilities in other parts of China. I was also advised that the Northern Koreans tried to get the Russians to intervene directly in taking over Southern Korea but the Russian reply was that they did not wish to initiate world war III by creating an incident in a minor area like Korea. Whether or not this is true, the fact remains that all those I talked with in Korea, which included our people and natives, felt that there was no immediate danger of the absorption of Southern Korea by the north. After all that we have done for the Southern Koreans and our public statements to the effect that we are endeavoring to support the urge for nationalism and freedom of these areas in the Far East, we would be definitely letting down all of the far-eastern peoples if we did not carry through on this Korean project.

I was most favorably impressed by Dr. Bunce and his advisers who are carrying on the ECA operations and I feel that we should give them a vote of confidence by an early appropriation for this further Korean development. While I did not have time to go into all the details of the proposed $150,000,000 authorization, I feel that a substantial sum should be authorized and appropriated so that there will be no stoppage of the pipe line which is taking supplies and materials to the Koreans at the present time.

E. Guam and the Pacific trusteed islands

On our way home by air we stopped at Guam, which is today an American possession, and also in the Pacific trusteed islands, which the United States holds as trustee under action by the United Nations. In Guam we were entertained by Governor and Mrs. Skinner and our military and naval people there, and in our short stay were presented with the problem facing the people of Guam; namely, some sort of organic act to give them status as a Territory of the United States. It is contemplated that the Guamanian Parliament will send representatives to Washington early in 1950 to discuss with us their present status and the kind of legislation they would like to see adopted in order to give them the new status they aspire to.

The Pacific trusteed islands, of course, are a study in themselves, but I took occasion when I was in Guam and Honolulu to discuss the responsibilities we have assumed in this trusteeship. I am happy to note that a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs is visiting the islands this fall and doubtless will come back with specific recommendations. We can get some idea of the size of the problem when we realize that the area covered by this group of islands is about the same as the entire United States. These islands are of great importance to us strategically and for our air service to the Pacific, and certainly they cannot again be permitted to fall into hostile hands.

F. Hawaii

On our way home we stopped in Hawaii where we had the privilege of conferring with Admiral Ginrich, Chief of Staff for Admiral Radford (who was in the United States at the time, and Admiral Fiske, who has the immediate responsibility for the trusteed islands. Again we were given the opportunity to see all that there was to see in the limited time at our disposal, and to get the reflections of opinion from these experienced and able representatives of the United States.

PART III. THE PROBLEM OF CHINA

As I stated in an earlier part of this report our main objective in taking this difficult trip was to get the feel of the Chinese situation. We were handicapped in this because of the difficulty and practical impossibility of getting inside China. Again General MacArthur came to our rescue by making it possible for us to go to Hong Kong and later to Formosa, where we had the opportunity of studying some of the problems that exist there. Everywhere we went in the Far East, China is a primary subject of discussion. People with whom we talked are divided into two main classes: first, those who follow the general line of United States policy and look upon the Nationalist cause as completely washed up; second, those who are sharply critical of the United States policy, who feel that we are largely to blame for the let-down of morale of the Nationalists and who feel that there is still salvage in the existing situation, desperate though it is. We are compelled to face the fact that the situation is desperate and without seeking to lay the blame as to where the fault lies at the moment, our immediate objective is to find a formula for the future.

In Hong Kong in addition to conferring with members of our American consulate we had the privilege of talking with the British authorities. It is interesting to note that the attitude of the British has been and probably will continue to be fundamentally different in its approach to the problem than ours. The British have a commercial stake in the Far East that we have never had and in their present precarious financial condition they have every incentive to preserve that stake and save what they can. I fear that this commercial pressure on them will prevent their taking the long range view and may lead them to immediate policies of appeasement and conciliation, which may well be a threat to the entire future of the Far East. Hong Kong is a British colony and the British intend to defend it at all costs. They have increased their military forces, their air forces and their navy, and probably from a purely military standpoint they would out-match the Chinese Communists. The great danger of their position, however, is that Hong Kong is an island with an inadequate food and water supply, and with an over population at the time because of the influx of refugees from other parts of China. As food and water would have to be brought in from the outside and as the Chinese population itself might be led by subversive influences to revolt, it is readily conceivable that Hong Kong might fall just as it did in World War II, and as Singapore did in that war.

This suggests that the British would be prepared to recognize the Chinese Communist Government in exchange for a hands-off policy in Hong Kong, and in exchange for trade relationships which are being pressed on the British by their business interests in Singapore, Hong Kong, and other Chinese cities. It is my judgment that the British are desirous of taking the step of recognition in order to calm down the difficulties of the moment, but they would hesitate to do so unless we join them in this move. As I will point out later in the recommendations of my report I am strongly opposed to recognition of the Chinese Communist Government because I feel that the movement was inspired in Moscow, the present Chinese leaders were trained in Moscow, they are now being directed by Moscow, and they are being supplied by Moscow. We should no more recognize the Chinese Communist Government than we should recognize Russia itself if she was the foreign invader of China and had conquered China.

It was our privilege to talk with American-trained Chinese who have the vision of the Western Christian tradition and who, I believe, would sincerely make any personal sacrifice to save China from the dangers that now threaten it. We had the privilege of conferring at some length with Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, who in spite of all the mistakes that he has admittedly made in dealing with this situation, is nevertheless, in my judgment, one of the most important figures that World War II produced, and who still has much to contribute to the salvation of his country. In our conference with him we purposely avoided discussion of any further military assistance. We made it as clear as we could that we were not thinking in military terms so that there could be no possible implication that further military aid would be forthcoming. What we did stress was that the Nationalist Government had not offered the Chinese people any program of reform and rehabilitation which competed adequately with the Communist promises. We pointed out that even on the island of Formosa which had formerly been Japanese territory the Nationalists, when they took over, could have made the island an ideal Chinese province with all the reforms that the Chinese people were yearning for. Unfortunately the island has had two Nationalist governors, both of whom had the purely militaristic point of view, and who treated the Formosan people not as liberated Chinese but as a conquered population. It is to be hoped that the new governor, by whom we were entertained and who impressed us very favorably, may show a complete about-face in this tragically erroneous policy.

A difficulty with the Nationalists today is that there are two groups competing for control. One is a military group, thinking only in military terms, and the other is a civilian group which is laying more emphasis on agrarian and other reforms. The United States has been handicapped in its effort up to some months ago to give military aid because the aid that we turned over to the Nationalist Government apparently quickly found itself in Communist hands. The mistake that we made in this respect was in not having an American controlled set-up, which could insure that the aid reached its ultimate intended destination. There has unfortunately been serious mismanagement and inefficiency by the Nationalists, and these are the dangers which have determined our policy to furnish no further military aid under present conditions.

The facts of the Chinese situation can be fairly simply stated. The morale and leadership and the strength of the Nationalist Government, which was the foundation of Chiang Kai-shek's brilliant leadership in the war against Japan, has collapsed because of military mistakes and internal jealousies. It has also collapsed because of the thread of misunderstanding and ineptness on our part which runs through the whole post VJ-day story. My own judgment is that we did not thoroughly understand the Chinese psychology and we seemed to come to the conclusion that the only alternative to further military aid was complete abandonment or at least temporary inaction, which to them was the same as abandonment, and contributed to the break-down of whatever morale was left.

From our personal contacts I am prepared to deny the unfortunate propaganda that all Chinese in the Nationalist ranks are corrupt. Many of the finest Chinese that we met still stand by the Nationalist cause. They were not able to prevail probably because democratic processes have not yet been set up in China. The Nationalist Government has remained too military. We were advised that many honest men did all they could to induce the "Gimo" (Chiang) to bring in essential reforms. But the Gimo's experience has unfortunately been with the sword and he finds difficulty in really taking the "reform" approach seriously. The weakness of the Nationalists has not primarily been corruption, as so often and, I believe erroneously charged, but a leadership that has not really understood Western democracy.

And that is why I want to stress that in my judgment, we have overlooked a far more important factor in this situation than mere military aid. That factor is what might be called the psychological or ideological factor which could have meant support and backing for those high-minded Chinese whom we well knew and who were seeking reform and who should never have been given the discouragement that came from the feeling that their old traditional friend, the United States, had abandoned them in their time of greatest crisis.

PART IV. OVER-ALL OBSERVATIONS

The situation in the Far East is admittedly very complicated with currents and cross-currents making it difficult for any complete diagnosis. On such a short trip as we took I would hesitate to try and draw any final conclusions, and I agree with those who have stated that our attitude must remain flexible because of the constant day to day changes in the picture. With this emphasis on flexibility I would like to make the following general observations:

1. Nationalism and freedom

It is immediately obvious to anyone visiting the Far East that there is a widespread yearning among all peoples in this area to express their own nationalism and to be free from external controls. There is definitely a revolt against imperialism in any form and the traditional colonialism. This leads to a propaganda of hatred toward foreigners which, of course, the Chinese Communists have capitalized on. The Russians, being familiar with the Far Eastern psychology and the traditional opposition to foreign invaders in the China area, have been smart enough not to open themselves to that attack. Consequently, as they have also done in the satellite countries of Europe, they have made their penetration by training nationals to carry the torch for them. Whatever policy we adopt in the future must recognize this normal and commendable urge for self-expression.

2. Economic reform and rehabilitation

In addition to this yearning for nationalism and freedom there appears to be an urge for economic reform and rehabilitation. The threat of famine and hunger is always before these masses in the Far East. Here, again, the Chinese Communists have sensed the need and furthermore their promises of agrarian and other reforms have had great weight in weaning the people away from the Nationalist government, which failed to offer any reforms when it had the opportunity.

3. Need of American "Far East-mindedness"

In talking with representatives of the United States it seemed apparent to me that those who are on the firing line in that area feel that the people back home whom they represent are more concerned with the problems of Europe and the Near East than with the far-eastern problems. This is understandable and explained by the fact that practically all of us in the United States come from European ancestry and, therefore, we naturally think in terms of the type of problems that Europe presents. Europe is so much nearer to us in our thinking that the threats coming from Europe are more realistic than the far distant Asia. In spite of this fact, however, it is clear that in Asia we have an area comprising an enormous part of the entire world's surface, with a population of upward of a billion people, and that while we are preoccupied with Europe the real threat of world war III may be approaching us from the Asiatic side.

4. A divided authority

I discovered in the areas visited a feeling that our United States representatives were handicapped in their handling of Far East problems because we are dealing with them in compartments rather than as a whole. There is a divided command. General MacArthur has general supervision of Japan and the islands lying south of Japan and running through the Philippines. This is today our Pacific line of defense in the Far East. In addition he is doing an outstanding job in Japan in the difficult role of conqueror occupying the land of the conquered. But he is in the embarrassing position of having nothing whatever to do with the mainland of Asia, which is under the jurisdiction of our naval forces. Our military and naval commanders with whom I talked seemed to be agreed that there should be a unification of authority in the entire area, and also that an over-all ideological as well as purely military approach to the problems was necessary if we were to meet the challenge that communism is making to millions of these people. The policy of "let the dust settle" completely ignores this other and more important approach.

I was left with the definite impression that in the Far East there is no one finger on the pulse of all the problems in which all of these countries are so intimately related. Certainly from the military and general strategical point of view this is a critical weakness.

5. The military future

While the final chapter has not yet been written so far as the military operations in China are concerned, it seems clear that at the present moment the military phase of the so-called Chinese Civil War is critical. The Chinese Nationalist government, which had received our support and on which we pinned our hopes, and Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, whom we believed would be the bright shining star in the Far Eastern firmament, have both shown serious weaknesses so far as military operations are concerned. Whether what is left of the China mainland can be held by the Nationalists, or whether Formosa can be defended are questions not yet answered.

These are problems that should be given immediate attention by whatever agency is set up by us to determine the most effective use to be made of the $75,000,000 flexible fund. This was the special fund appropriated by the Congress to be used by the President to stop the spread of communism in China and the Far East.

6. The morale factor

In talking with people whose views represent both sides of the Chiang Kai-shek controversy I came to the conclusion that there was a tendency to think that the only alternative to further military aid to the Nationalist government was the abandonment of China entirely. In talking with prominent Chinese leaders, whom I found had ideals for China other than mere military victory for the Nationalist government, I sensed a feeling of despair because of their abandonment by the United States at this crisis in their history. Since the days of the Boxer indemnity scholarships, the open door, and our strong stands for China's territorial integrity, advanced Chinese thinkers have looked to the United States for advanced Chinese thinkers have looked to the United States for leadership in the areas of education and in spiritual advancement. These thinkers emphasized the point that as serious as the loss of our military support was, there was even more serious loss to the Chinese people of those morale-building factors which Americans and American-trained Chinese had heretofore contributed. It would seem as though in our dealings during the last few years with the Chinese we underestimated the importance of this distinction between morale-building factors and mere military might. Consequently our most recent contributions of military supplies, and especially the last $125,000,000 under the ECA bill of last year, were of no value whatever since prior to the turning over of those supplies the morale of the people had collapsed.

7. "Salvage" in the situation

Because of this morale factor, which it is very hard to define and lay our hands on in a practical way, I feel that there is a "latent salvage" right now in the situation which we cannot afford to neglect. There are Chinese leaders with whom I talked in Hong Kong, in Tokyo and in Formosa who are, figuratively speaking, holding out their hands to us with a plea to continue to believe in their basic objectives and to continue to help them maintain their courage against these tremendous odds of military defeat. These are the real standard bearers against the creeping paralysis of Russian-inspired Chinese communism. These individuals might well be described as oases in the vast desert of China, and I have no doubt that through the entire area there are those who would dally to a courageous ideological approach aimed at Chinese rehabilitation.

PART V. SPECIFIC IMMEDIATE RECOMMENDATIONS

In light of these general observations what recommendations can be made for positive, constructive action at this time?

In considering this question I want to emphasize again that I have no final and conclusive answers and, therefore, what I am suggesting is simply an approach to the whole problem and an honest recognition of its difficulty and immensity.

What I am pleading for is an attitude of mind by us which will give hope and courage to those who are still willing to remain faithful to what they believe in. In this spirit I make the following specific recommendations:

1. A united far eastern command

Our over-all command in the development of our policy in the Far East should be unified in one control such as General MacArthur has so ably demonstrated in Japan, which will recognize not only the strategic military problems of the area from the standpoint of the security of the United States, but also and especially will appreciate the fact that we are engaged in an ideological war—a war to capture the minds of men.

2. The $75,000,000 flexible fund

In order to make the most effective use of the $75,000,000 flexible fund, there should immediately be appointed a committee or agency, familiar with the situation from experience on the ground. This agency would advise the President as to the practicability of military projects which might be developed to carry out the fund's objectives.

Specifically I suggest that such a committee be made up of such outstanding men as General MacArthur, Admiral Badger, General Wedemeyer, Admiral Berkey, General

Chennault, and Ambassador Leighton Stewart.

Such a committee would certainly have the united approval of the American people.

3. No recognition of Chinese Communist Government

Inasmuch as the practically unanimous opinion of all those with whom I talked was that the present Communist movement was originally initiated in Moscow, its leaders were trained in Moscow, and it is now being directed from Moscow, I am opposed to any recognition of the Chinese Communist Government by the United States. The Chinese Communist advance is definitely an alien invasion and is undermining the aspirations for nationalism and freedom which all of these far eastern countries are struggling to attain.

4. Program of reform and rehabilitation—No military aid

While I would recommend that we continue our present recognition of the Nationalist Government as long as it survives, I would leave the question of further military aid to the discretion of the President, acting with advice of the agency to be set up under recommendation 2 above. As a policy we should emphasize primarily the importance of the development of an ideological program of reform and rehabilitation, which should be practically applied immediately in the areas still occupied by the Nationalists.

What I mean by this is that there should be developed such a reform program in the non-Communist western provinces, in the area of Chungking (until and unless Chungking falls), on the island of Hainan, and particularly on the island of Formosa. On the island of Formosa there is an outstanding opportunity to develop for the Formosan people themselves a program which would mean the assurance of their freedom and the rehabilitation of their industries, and especially their agriculture. I believe that this possibility should be explored immediately with the Nationalist Government now in control of Formosa and with the Taiwan people themselves, who are opposed both to the Chinese Communists and also to the Nationalists. I believe that the Taiwan people would cooperate with the Nationalist Government in setting up through our ECA operations a type of recovery which might be an example to other provinces in China now in desperate need. Furthermore, Formosa is ideally located for the development of our Voice of America program which, however, I would not call the "Voice of America," but rather the "Voice of the New China."

5. Formosa must not fall into hostile hands

I recognize that because of the unsettled conditions on the island of Formosa today, the previous proposal might be difficult of accomplishment. But whether or not that proposal could be accomplished, it is my urgent recommendation that under no circumstances must we let the island of Formosa fall into hands hostile to the United States. This is not only because Formosa might be the last bastion opposing the Communist wave in China, but also because Formosa, if in hostile hands, would threaten the island bases in the eastern Pacific from Japan to the north and down through Okinawa and the Philippines in the south.

At the present moment Formosa has an uncertain legal status. It was a part of Japan prior to World War II. It is occupied today by the Chinese Nationalist forces because it was agreed at Cairo that it would be returned to China at the conclusion of the Japanese war. Technically, however, until the peace with Japan is ratified the area is still a part of Japanese territory and could be included in our Japanese military occupation. I recommend that this situation be carefully explored with the further recommendation that any possible steps taken should be reported at once to the United Nations with an expression of determination on our part to keep the island out of the war area and to assist in its economic development. We might explore the possibility of a United Nations trusteeship pending such time as the ultimate sovereignty of the island could be determined.

6. Admit and correct mistakes

I recommend the following moves to correct what appear to be mistakes of policy:

(a) Discontinue making Chiang Kai-shek and other Nationalist leaders "political lepers." With all their alleged mistakes they merit our interest and help. They can help build the New China.

(b) Discontinue our present policy of watchful waiting and become positive in our support of anti-Communist resistance in the Far East.

(c) Do not permit short range financial pressures to outweigh long range ideological objectives.

7. Over-all advisory group

I recommend that in order that we may keep our hands on the day-to-day changes in the far-eastern situation, that we continue the advisory committee appointed by the Secretary of State: Ambassador-at-Large Philip Jessup; Raymond B. Fosdick, former president of the Rockefeller Foundation; and Everett Case, president of Colgate University; and that we support this advisory committee by the appointment of a subcommittee of the Congress chosen on a bipartisan basis from the Foreign Relations and Armed Services Committees of the Senate and the corresponding committees in the House.

Should such a group of continuing advisers be appointed, I would recommend that the whole group or at least a subcommittee thereof proceed immediately to the Far East to observe conditions on the ground and to make specific recommendations for positive action.

8. Areas other than China

The foregoing recommendations are directed primarily to the difficult Chinese problem, but I would not limit our investigation and consideration to that single area. We have the problem of Korea to which I referred earlier in this report and which I had the privilege of visiting, and I feel that we are justified in carrying out an ECA rehabilitation program in light of the splendid progress the Koreans have made during the past year.

In addition to Korea, however, and the other areas which I have discussed earlier in this report, we must give consideration to the area bordering on China on the southwest, particularly Burma, Thailand (Siam), and French Indochina.

When Congress authorized the flexible $75,000,000 fund for military aid to be used in the area of China where the Communist advance might be threatening, it was definitely realized that there might be trouble in these spots and that prompt military aid might be justified. During my trip I was advised that there are at the present time real disturbances in Burma and French Indochina, but I was also advised that Thailand (Siam) is in the best shape politically and is strongly anti-Communist. All these areas need our immediate careful study and probable aid. The advisory agency provided for in recommendation 2 should make a study of these areas at once.

CONCLUSION

The time for effective action is now. America united on a far-eastern policy can and must definitely halt this creeping paralysis of communism, which today threatens every freedom that our forefathers fought, bled, and died for on this continent. A firm stand now is a way by which we can avert the horrors of a third world war.

Throughout our entire trip whether we were in Japan, in the Philippines, in Korea, or in parts of China, we could seem to sense the deep yearning of people for a new leadership which would mean freedom from superimposed controls and an end of war and fighting. This is an obviously difficult ideal to be attained, and it can only be attained if the powerful, peace-loving nations of the world courageously stand together against aggression and the rule of might. This may call for an early reconsideration of the United Nations Charter and a new approach to international cooperation to establish the rule of law and the protection of the weak against the aggression of the strong.

As we traveled and talked to people with different viewpoints we felt that this yearning for nationalism and freedom was bringing people closer together in an understanding in the truest sense of the brotherhood of man. People were meant by the great design to be free and to live together. It was never meant that any people on this globe should be subjected to the domination and control of any other people. The yearnings in the Far East and in other parts of the world for freedom is an expression of the recognition of these eternal truths.

The sympathy of the United States for these yearnings and the determination of our people to aid in this eternal quest for freedom must continue to be the foundation of our foreign policy.

NOVEMBER 29, 1949.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a few questions?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPARKMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am glad to yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I first want to commend the able Senator from New Jersey, who is a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, for having presented a very thoughtful discussion of this subject relative to the Far East although I see some very practical difficulties in the way of his so-called alternative, not the least of which, I am fearful, is the fact that it might be in effect like taking the Sudetenland away from the Czechs. In other words, their hope today of resisting communism rests pretty largely in the island of Formosa, and it would probably be most difficult for Hainan to be supported by the National Government of China if Formosa became jeopardized; so we cannot completely dissociate Hainan Island from the Formosan problem. But, at least, the Senator has presented a suggestion which is worthy of consideration.

I should like to ask the able Senator, since he is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relation and is familiar with the fact that on the 23d of last December the State Department sent out to its representatives abroad a memorandum which stated flatfootedly that Formosa had no strategic value, if he can give the names of the members of the committee within the State Department who drafted such memorandum.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I regret to say that I cannot. I have tried to find out who they were. I have been advised that the document was prepared by some of those members of the State Department who, a few years ago, were in the Far East and who, in approximately 1943 or 1944, sent back the first messages apparently supporting the new Communist agrarian reform movement, and apparently depreciating the Nationalist Government, forgetting that that government was carrying the load of the war against Japan, forgetting that it was doing the best it could against terrific odds, and especially in light of the fact the Senator brought out so ably last Thursday that our own policy certainly let down the Nationalist Government at Yalta, where the Manchurian question was disposed of without giving the Chinese any credit or voice.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I may say, if the Senator will yield further, that I made a request on the day the press association carried the report from Tokyo of the December 23 memorandum, that, as a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee and of the Senate Appropriations Committee, a copy be furnished to me. That request was denied at the time and it has not as yet been complied with. I then submitted, under date of January 7, the following letter to the Honorable Dean Acheson, Secretary of State, which I should like to read into the RECORD at this time, because I think it is appropriate to the Senator's remarks:

JANUARY 7, 1950.

Hon. DEAN ACHESON,
Secretary of State,
State Department,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ACHESON: I called the State Department this morning to request the names of the committee which had been responsible for drafting the December 23 memorandum advising the State Department personnel that Formosa had no strategic value.

I first attempted to get Mr. Peurifoy in the Personnel Division, but he was out of the city so I talked with Mr. Bryan and made the request of him. He said he had to take it up with higher authority. At about 11:15 this morning I received a call from Mr. George Kennan who stated that both Secretary Acheson and Under Secretary Webb were out of the city. However, he stated that the State Department itself assumed responsibility for any such information sent out and that he felt that he must decline to give me the names of the persons constituting the committee which drafted the document.

I emphasized to him that I felt that as a Member of the Senate of the United States, I was entitled to this information and while there might be some basis for the Department's position to decline to release a document which they themselves had classified, I could see no excuse for not furnishing a Member of Congress the names of such committee.

Sincerely yours,
WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND.

I should like to say to the able Senator, who has done much to bring to the floor of the Senate facts which I think the Senate and the country desperately need, that it seems to me the continued effort on the part of the State Department to lower the iron curtain between its own activities and the Congress of the United States and the public can be best expressed as running counter to Woodrow Wilson's concept of open covenants openly arrived at, in being secret diplomacy secretly arrived at. This is the public's business, and certainly it is a pertinent factor as to who constituted the committee which drafted a policy statement which said that Formosa had no strategic value, when I have every reason to believe that that is not the judgment of our responsible military and naval commanders and, indeed, it is my judgment that it is not the viewpoint of the Joint Chiefs themselves.

If the Senator will permit me further, let me say that I am not a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, but I have asked the very able Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] if I might attend a meeting of that committee in executive session tomorrow. With his usual courtesy he said that he would take the matter up with the committee, that it is possible that the committee might decide to permit visitors, but that he doubted very much the practicability of permitting questioning by some Senator who is not a member of the committee.

I have submitted to the able Senator from New Jersey, as I have to other Senators on the committee, and I desire to submit now to the Senate, certain questions which I believe are pertinent and to which I hope the Foreign Relations Committee may gain answers. If the committee is not successful in doing so, it will be the purpose of the junior Senator from California, since I feel that this question affects the strategic defense of the United States, to ask, through the Armed Services Committee, of which I am a member, and the Appropriations Committee, of which I am a member, the answers to those questions. I should like to get the answers, however, as soon as possible. The questions are as follows:

1. Who are the members of the policy group that drafted the December 23 memo stating that Formosa had no strategic value? Are John P. Davies and/or John S. Service members of this group?

2. Does the State Department or the National Defense Establishment have the views of General MacArthur or Admiral Radford on the strategic value of Formosa? Do either of them support the State Department's contention? Will any such views be made available to the Foreign Relations Committee in executive session?

3. Has the State Department any statement from the Joint Chiefs of Staff indicating they support the contention that Formosa in unfriendly hands is of no strategic importance to us?

4. Were the members of the National Security Council, when they met on December 29, informed regarding:

(a) The State Department memo of December 23 discounting the strategic value of Formosa;

(b) The request of the Chinese Government for aid which was received by the State Department on December 23?

5. What was the extent of the Chinese request of December 23 and any supplemental requests made since that date? Were they within the limits of existing legislation and appropriations? Will copies of such requests be made available to the Foreign Relations Committee in executive session?

6. Was the amount and scope of the Chinese requests made between December 23, 1949, and January 4, 1950, known to the President at the time of his press conference on January 5? Were such requests also made known to the Joint Chiefs of Staff; and if so, on what date were the Joint Chiefs informed?

7. Has the State Department information that the Chinese Communists are exercising an effective censorship on American citizens who have been allowed to leave China by holding responsible their Chinese friends not only for their financial obligations but also for any statements they may make regarding conditions in China?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I can say to the Senator that if he requests me to do so, I shall be glad to present those questions, if it is not possible for him to attend the meeting of the committee. I think he has a perfect right to have those questions answered; and I join him in my expression of interest in the answers.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I hope the Senator will do so. I want to make them available now, so that the State Department will be amply advised and have ready the information requested, because I think the members of the Foreign Relations Committee are entitled to categorical replies to the questions as well as are other Members of the Senate.

I may say to the able Senator, because I know of his deep interest in this matter, that the last question grows out of a communication which I received recently from a man who had been for 4 years in Peking. He remained behind the Communist lines at the time the Communists occupied that city. He has only recently been able to get out. For obvious reasons I shall not use his name, but I think the Senate should be advised of what I believe is a very effective means of censorship which the Chinese Communists are using on American citizens. I read:

One good reason why I have been inarticulate about present conditions in China is the fact that, in order to leave, I had to produce two guarantors who were willing to certify my reliability, etc. It would hardly be cricket to jeopardize them by rushing into print with an unfavorable report on the present administration and it would be impossible to write any other kind.

Then, to bear out what he has said, he goes on as follows:

The only trouble with my theory is that nobody seems willing to accept it. I have some good arguments, most or all of which you already know, but none are immediate enough to make a strong point and, in any case, I run into a lot of people with preconceived notions which contradict my own observed facts. The idea that the KCT is a benevolent group of agrarian reformers, for example, is dying very hard. I know that conditions in the Chinese countryside under the KCT are worse than under the KMT because I have seen and talked to any number of refugees fleeing from the areas taken over by the new government. I knew one case in detail where a family had some 25 mu of land (about 4 acres) and a bicycle. The new authorities took all but 14 mu (2 mu for each member of the family), and the bicycle, which was regarded as a capitalistic luxury. Taxes are heavy, the rates are a little difficult to estimate but seem to be calculated to take all but enough to keep the taxpayer alive. And, in addition, the public is subjected to a constant stream of propaganda and elaborate courses of instruction in party ideals which take up the spare time which was the peasant's only luxury. Much the same thing goes on in the cities. Attendance at celebrations and school sessions is controlled through the pao-chia system; the press and radio become outlets for pure propaganda, school curricula are dictated by politicians and enforced by policy, business comes to a virtual stop and every normal function of the economy is stifled by regulation and bureaucratic control. Much of the latter is idiotic and the administrators thereof are selected apparently because they know nothing whatever about the field with which they are concerned. I could go on for pages outlining the defects of the system as I found them, but suffice it to say I tried it out and it was too much for me.

Mr. President, that is not the only letter of that type I have received. I hope the Senator will press very diligently in the committee to see how long the State Department has been informed, if they are informed, that this type of censorship is being exercised on Americans who have gotten out of there, in an effort to prevent the American public being advised of the true conditions.

One final point I hope the Senator will bear in mind, namely, that as early as 1944 and 1945, as will be found by an examination of the China white paper, starting on page 564 and running through for some subsequent pages, Mr. Davies and Mr. Service were in China. As long ago as 1944, almost 6 years ago, they were predicting the immediate downfall of the National Government of China. They were urging, as will be found by a reading of the letter, a coalition of the Communists in China, and they were urging that the Government of the United States might start playing "footsy" with the Communists in China, even at that early date. So, I think my question as to whether either or both of these gentlemen had anything to do with this memorandum of December 23, saying that Formosa had no strategic value, is a pertinent question. If it is not answered tomorrow, I intend to press it in other places until we do get an answer to the question.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I thank the Senator.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield for a question.

Mr. FERGUSON. Did the Senator find any evidence in the Pacific that, from a military viewpoint, Formosa was not of strategic value to the United States?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I will say that very definitely I did not.

A suggestion has been made in some of the press that General MacArthur in a way was propagandizing me. I will say that General MacArthur never said anything to me until I asked him the explicit question. The first apprehension I had about Formosa I got in the Philippines. I did not talk to General MacArthur about it, but I went to the Philippines almost immediately, where some people said I might get information in Japan. So, when I returned to Japan I asked MacArthur about the Formosa situation. I initiated the inquiry. He did not ask me, as was suggested in some of the newspapers and in some of the comments.

Mr. FERGUSON. I compliment the Senator on the remarks he has made today, because I think they have been of great benefit to the Senate. I notice the Senator started out with the statement that there was a lack of policy. Was the Senator able to discover just what our policy was in the Far East?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Not only could I not discover it, but I was very much disturbed by having members of our Defense Establishment, and even members of the State Department Establishment—cautiously, of course, because they did not want to put themselves in an embarrassing position, and, of course, I would not quote them—indicate their great appreciation of my coming, for instance, from the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, so that they could say what they felt they had to say to someone about the lack of policy in that area and the embarrassment they were having because we did not have any policy in our dealings with the peoples there. I got the distinct impression from our own representatives there that they were concerned, first, over the lack of policy, and, second, over Formosa, and I did not hear any dissenting voice.

Mr. FERGUSON. As I understand, at least one of the purposes of our having military forces in the Pacific is to carry out the foreign policy of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. That is correct.

Mr. FERGUSON. That is, to implement it.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. That is correct.

Mr. FERGUSON. Was the Senator able to discover what our policy in the Pacific was that was to be implemented?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I think that in Japan, where a reasonably free hand has been given to General MacArthur and where I am sure he is acting as the State Department would have him act, we have indicated a policy for that particular responsibility.

I think that in the Philippines Ambassador Cowan, to whom I want to pay the highest tribute, is doing a most constructive job in a difficult situation, seeking to help a young republic with its growing pains, a new nation coming into its own, trying to assist them in their economic problems. I felt that he had a program he was working on. But the important consideration with everybody was: Here we are stymied because there is no policy for China, and China is the key to this whole situation. If China goes communistic, the whole area will be in jeopardy. That is the feeling I got, though the Senator from Michigan, who was there himself, may have gotten a different feeling.

Mr. FERGUSON. I wish to ask the Senator if possibly he and I cannot agree on the thesis that we have had a policy of appeasement in the Far East, and that we are in effect carrying out that policy. Let us say that it is partly open and partly secret.

Is it not true that it was the feeling of some in the State Department at the close of the war, and prior to the close of the war that Russia was entitled to have on her borders in the west friendly nations, and we knew, prior to the close of the war, that Russia was setting up communistic governments for Poland and various other countries in the west? Is it not also true that, being desirous of having at least some signs of democracy in those governments, we asked for free elections, having in mind that Russia wanted to have friendly governments on her borders in the west? Is it not further true that finally we discovered that what she had in mind by "free elections" was the installation of Communist governments and that we waked up to the sorry fact that although Russia agreed to free elections, as we called them or asked for them, they were absolutely controlled elections, as she desired?

Is it not true that the American policy in the east was identical? Was it not understood that Korea was to have a government free from communism, but the American policy was to dictate to the Koreans that in their government they had to take in so many Communists? In other words, the policy was that Russia was entitled to a friendly government on her border, and we insisted on Communists going into the government. Is it not true that that was secret, that it was unknown to the American people? But in December of 1945, when we sent General Marshall to China, we instructed him, as is shown by the instructions, to demand in China the identical thing we demanded in Korea, namely, that the government of China take Communists into it.

Therefore we had a policy in the Pacific identical with the policy in the European theater, that Russia was to have friendly governments on her borders, and to this day America has had a policy of allowing her that privilege.

This is the difficulty: These friendly governments are entirely different from what the Senator and I understand as friendly governments on our borders. We ask only that on our borders we have free and independent people, not controlled by a foreign power, whereas to Russia, to communism, a friendly government is one that is controlled from Moscow. Therefore, a friendly government which attempts to take into its bosom Communists, will end up with nothing but communism, as occurred in the west. I ask the Senator whether or not he found such facts to exist in the east?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I will not say that I found all those facts in detail. I did find that there had been, as the Senator says, the endeavor to bring about a coalition in the early stages of the Korean picture. I did find that the south Koreans were very strongly against that, and I believe Dr. Rhee himself told me definitely that he was opposed to a coalition. I am not sure about that, however.

So far as the remainder of the Senator's statement is concerned, while I cannot say that I found collaboration difficult, a sequence of documents, and so forth, certainly shows a trend or pattern. The history of the satellite states in the west, that is in the east of Europe but in the western part of the world today, and the trend today in China, indicate a pattern which has been followed very definitely by the Communists. In the beginning, I think, we were misled by that pattern and went along in the hope of bringing about peace, as the Senator intimated. But after we had seen the terrible things that happened in the satellite states in eastern Europe, some of which I saw personally; after we had seen what happened in Poland, in Czechoslovakia, in Hungary, in Bulgaria, and in Rumania, where purges of members of the existing governments took place, and harsh conditions were imposed on the existing governments, we should have realized what would happen in China; that the same pattern would be followed in China, and that China would be lost to the Communists in the same way as the satellite countries of western Europe were lost to them.

Mr. FERGUSON. When our Nation deals with what we believe to be, or what we hope is a "friendly government," meaning thereby a free as well as a friendly government, and when our Nation later discovers that the nation with which we are dealing has an entirely different conception of the meaning of the term "friendly government," and considers another government to be "friendly" only if that government is communistic, does not the Senator from New Jersey believe we should be released from any understandings or agreements based on our belief that we are dealing with a "friendly" government?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. If there was any such understanding I should certainly say that what has since happened releases us from such understanding or agreement as we have entered into, because we have now found that Russia, by the method of infiltration used by her, has brought about Communist conquest of her satellite nations.

The suggestion has been made that there is danger of some of the Asian countries bordering on China being invaded and conquered by the Chinese armies. I do not believe such a thing will happen. I think the Moscow Communists are too smart for that. I believe they will hold the Chinese Communists away from the borders of the surrounding countries, but that the Communist movement will come from within the bordering countries, as it did in China itself. I do not believe there will be external aggression into the surrounding countries, from across the border of China. The Chinese Communists will keep away from that because they know that that is something which will be rejected by the Asian people themselves.

What I am hoping for is to give the small Asian countries the knowledge that the United States is interested in their yearnings for their own nationalism, without interference by any outside power, and when I say that, I mean by Russia, with the methods she has used in obtaining control in China. I say further that any recognition by us, de jure or de facto, should not mean that we are in favor of such a policy as that which is now being followed by the Communists in China.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Did the Senator obtain information in the east, and on the island of Formosa, leading him to the conclusion that the Formosan people were of the opinion that in effect America was instigating a revolution on the island of Formosa?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I heard that stated in various quarters, but I do not have sufficient evidence to be sure that there is anything to it. I did hear it stated that some Americans there had stirred up some Formosans to revolt against the Nationalists. I do not have any evidence to substantiate that, however. It was simply common talk.

Mr. FERGUSON. It was common talk.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON. Does not the Senator believe that such common talk tends to instigate a revolution under the circumstances, particularly in view of the fact that America is following a policy of giving no financial or military aid toward the defense of Formosa?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Yes, it might very well do so, and I think the writing off of Formosa by the United States might mean a revolution there in a very short time. That is one of the reasons I gave for the plea I made the other day for the other approach and a different kind of a solution for the Formosan people.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Has the Senator any evidence that prior to January 1, 1950, America had decided not to give any military aid to the Nationalist Government, as announced on January 5 by the President? Prior to that time did the Senator know that such a policy was our policy but had not been announced, so far as the American public was concerned?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I had no evidence of it, but, of course, from talking, as I did, with the Secretary of State, and with men like Mr. Fosdick and others, I knew that they were seriously considering denying any further military aid of any sort to the Nationalist Government of Formosa. I knew it was being considered. That is why I sent my letter of November 27 to the Secretary suggesting an alternative approach to the Formosan question, if we did not give them any military assistance.

Mr. FERGUSON. But was the Senator familiar with the fact that as early as last October the United States Government advised the Nationalist Government of China that we would not give any military aid to nor defend Formosa, which is in terms what was said on January 5, 1950?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I was not aware that it had been done on that particular date. I thought that about that time the decision was being arrived at, and one reason I was concerned over this approach was because those of us who had been to Formosa and had a chance to learn of some of these issues felt we were entitled to sit down with members of the State Department and discuss the possible solution of the Formosan problem without the problem being prejudged. That was my thought respecting the approach to the Formosan problem. However, we were not even considered.

Mr. FERGUSON. I ask the distinguished Senator whether the instructions, dated December 23, respecting the Pacific situation, at least as released by the press associations, did not indicate that so far as the State Department was concerned they had charged off Formosa as not being strategically necessary in America's scheme of things, and also whether they did not indicate clearly that we had then decided, that is, as early as December 23, that Formosa would receive no military aid, nor other assistance, and instructions were given to officials in the Far East that when the fall of Formosa came, they would have an excuse, or at least an alibi to give as the reason why Formosa had fallen?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I think that is true; and that is why we were all surprised that on December 29, as I recall the date, there was a meeting of the National Security Council, as though that Council would determine the disposition of Formosa. The question had been settled and determined long before that, and those who wanted to have the matter reconsidered, as I understand the Defense Department did, were simply told, apparently, that the matter had been decided, and that they did not need the advice of our experts.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at that point, because what I have to say fits in with what is now being said.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I ask the Senator from New Jersey, who serves very ably on the Foreign Relations Committee, whether, when the new committee to study the Far East, headed by Dr. Jessup, and including the other two gentlemen the Senator names, was set up, his impression was that before any final decision was made in regard to our far-eastern policy that committee would presumably make its report; that the report would not only be available to the State Department for study, but presumably would be available at least to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee for study, so that there could be joint discussions prior to any final decision relative to writing off of China?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Yes; I am sure that was the original intention. But I was advised when I returned, that the committee of three was to be a continuing committee, and while they had discussed policy with the President, nothing was to go to the public until Mr. Jessup, who was chairman of the committee, had gone to the Far East and made his report. Another thing that came as a great surprise was that these decisions were made while Mr. Jessup was still in the Far East. We expected that nothing would be done at least until he had come back and told what he had found. That was an extraordinary action.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Could the able Senator from New Jersey enlighten the Senate as to what good was to be expected, so far as our Chinese policy is concerned, by sending Dr. Jessup to China, and by announcing that on February 1 the Joint Chiefs were going to the Far East to discuss with General MacArthur the general strategic situation in that area of the world, if before either group, that is either Dr. Jessup or the Joint Chiefs have had a chance to carry on their consultations or bring back their reports, the country and the Senate had already been presented with a fait accompli?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I agree with the implications of the Senator's question entirely, and I was as much at a loss as he is to understand why we need to have Mr. Jessup go to the Far East, or why we need to have the Joint Chiefs go there, if all the strategic questions are to be decided in Washington without consultations whatsoever with those on the ground in the Far East. That is one of the puzzles we have been troubled by, and which brought up the debate, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Along the same line as that just suggested by the Senator from California, we have the sending of Mr. Jessup to the Far East, and the proposal to send the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the Far East, and then we have the announcement of policy on January 5. In October the United States Government advised the Nationalist Government that we would not give military or any other help toward the defense of the island of Formosa, which was followed on the 23d day of December by instructions to the State Department officials in the Far East respecting policy. In view of what occurred in October and December, I ask the Senator from New Jersey why Dr. Jessup should have been sent to the Far East to look into the making of a policy in relation to the strategic value and the importance of Formosa and its defense, so far as America is concerned? Why would we send him, even by airplane, after the fact was already announced by the Nationalist Government?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. That is a difficult question to answer. I will say for Mr. Jessup, whom I have known for many years, and for whom I have the highest regard; that he went to the Far East not only for the matters we are discussing, but also to discuss some other matters relative to the Far East, in connection with which the Communist problem arises. So he went for that additional reason.

But I understand the reason he went there to discuss the Formosan question—I understand he is there for that purpose now—was so that he might obtain information on the scene and might get advice from the Joint Chiefs, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEHMAN in the Chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield further to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Does the Senator from New Jersey believe now that the announcement by the President on January 5 forecloses the question of the strategic value of Formosa in the scheme of things, so far as the United States is concerned? Is that now a closed book?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. As a Member of the United States Senate, I certainly hope it is not, because I feel the enormous responsibility all of us have to be sure that our country is safe. If our Chiefs of Staff and our military men generally, especially those in the Far East whom I saw, still think Formosa a strategic area—and they know more about it than I do—then it is very difficult for me to reconcile myself, I regret to state, with the decision of the administration, because the safety of the United States means more to me than agreeing with the decision of the administration. I think we must get the best advice and information we can obtain on this matter, before the door is finally locked. That question should be asked.

Mr. FERGUSON. Then, is it the view of the Senator from New Jersey, that if it is the opinion of our best brains, so far as military matters are concerned, that Formosa is of strategic value, that decision should be held in abeyance?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Yes; because from the standpoint of defense, I feel that we would be justified in defending Formosa from an attack from the mainland.

Mr. FERGUSON. Does the distinguished Senator from New Jersey believe that if the Reds in China, either through infiltration and revolution from within or by outside direct attack, obtain Formosa, there will then be on the island of Formosa a government unfriendly to the United States of America?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON. There is no doubt about that in the Senator's mind; is there?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Not a bit. Furthermore, if the Chinese Communists move in and take over Formosa and make it a part of China, there is not the slightest doubt in my mind that if those in Moscow want to set up bases there, even if they do not make any noise about it, they will be definitely able to set up bases that will be a threat to our lifeline, including Okinawa. Therefore, I think it may be necessary for every member of our Armed Services Committee to go there. It is a serious threat to the peace of the world today.

Mr. FERGUSON. I wish to agree with the Senator that it is so vital and so important that we should not consider it a closed book, so far as the message of January 5 is concerned.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I hope we will not have to.

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. FLANDERS. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from New Jersey whether he feels it would alter the very wise course he has proposed if we should suddenly learn that the administration had recognized the Communist government of China. What difference would it make to the proposals the Senator from New Jersey has made?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. If we still considered that the Formosan status was in abeyance pending the signing of the Japanese peace treaty—and very good lawyers have argued to me that that is the position it is in since the agreement of the Cairo Conference, that Formosa was to go to China, has not been carried out legally, and will not be until the peace treaty is signed—if that is the position, we still would be able to deal with Formosa after the Chinese Reds were recognized, if they were. But their recognition would put us in a very difficult position. I assume that the Senator from Vermont would agree with me as to that.

Mr. FLANDERS. I would agree; but if our Government recognized the Chinese Communist Government, I am still a little concerned about how the matter might work out in this respect——

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. The Senator will understand that the Senator from New Jersey is definitely opposed to the recognition of the Communist Chinese Government by the Government of the United States.

Mr. FLANDERS. I say to the Senator from New Jersey that that makes two of us.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I think something more I shall say along that line will be agreed to by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. FLANDERS. I would not be surprised.

But so long as our recognition remains, by sorry default, with the Nationalist Government of China, it would seem that the position we would be in if we followed the Senator's suggestion as to what we should do about Formosa in the meantime, would be more unpalatable to the Russian Government than would be the case if the Communist Government in China were recognized. Would there not then be, on the part of the Russian Government, a tendency, with the recognition of the Communist Government in China, to hurry up the conclusion of the Japanese peace treaty, to speed up the whole process so that we would have little chance to accomplish the things the Senator from New Jersey is suggesting be undertaken in the case of the Island of Formosa?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am not entirely clear about the question the Senator has asked, because certainly I am not endeavoring to find a conclusion or an alternative that is palatable to Russia or to Moscow.

Mr. FLANDERS. No; we are not. However, if our Government is to make an effective psychological beachhead in Formosa, and at the same time should recognize the Chinese Communist Government, I wonder how long it would be before we arrived at a conclusion of the peace treaty, so far as Japan is concerned, and before that island fell into the Communists' hands. It would seem to me that the recognition of Communist China becomes that much more dangerous.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Oh, I agree entirely with the Senator. I did not quite understand the point of his question. I agree entirely. It would bolster up my position and my suggestion if we refrain from recognizing Communist China. Of course, if we recognize Communist China, we are going to be in a very difficult position in this whole matter.

Mr. FLANDERS. However, so far as we can judge, that is a possibility to be reckoned with, because it is in line with our experience on this floor, of being faced with a series of unpleasant, unwise faits accompli. It would be another of them.

I do not expect to be free from the fear of waking up some morning and finding that the Communist Chinese Government has been recognized.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I may say to the distinguished Senator from Vermont that not only I, but other members of the committee, have had assurance from the Secretary of State that recognition will not be accorded without full consultation with the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate and the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House. But the difficulty of that is that the decision which may be made with respect to Formosa may put us in a position where we shall be following the band wagon in the wrong direction, whereas we should be leading the procession in the right direction.

Mr. FLANDERS. I should like to conclude by complimenting the Senator from New Jersey on the broader definition he has given to the word "strategic." I think he is of the opinion that Formosa is of strategic value from the military standpoint; but he has also given a truly wise and truly broad and truly practical extension of the word "strategic" into the style of warfare in which the Russian Government is preeminently skillful, and that is the strategy of psychological and spiritual warfare. I wish to express my gratitude to the Senator from New Jersey for displaying that kind of strategy, in which we are so deficient, and in which the opposing side has been so extremely effective at so little monetary cost.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I thank the Senator. I merely state in that connection that it is my distinct feeling that we have missed the whole possibility in Asia because we have not realized that there is going on all over the world a cold war to capture the minds of men, and that it may be well worth considering having an immediate cessation of hostilities in the hot war—if we can hold Formosa while we do it—if we can turn our psychological guns on the cold war, to capture the minds of men and teach them the great values of the western Christian tradition.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. It will be my final question of the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am glad to yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Relative to the statement the Senator just made, in answer to the question of the Senator from Vermont, regarding the commitments to discuss the matter with the members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the House Foreign Affairs Committee, prior to recognition, has the able Senator from New Jersey any assurances that such discussion with the two committees dealing with foreign relations in the two Houses of Congress will be any more than the Secretary's coming in, some morning, and saying, "We have determined to recognize the Communist regime in China; we wanted you to be notified before the statement was given to the press"?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I said what I did because at this stage of the game, I am going to give the Secretary of State the benefit of the doubt. He must realize what we feel is meant by charting and formulating these decisions, and if it is another case of merely handing us something to sign on the dotted line, he will know perfectly well that there will be some very strong dissents.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. I am sorry I had to be absent from the floor. I am simply going to ask a very brief question, but I shall preface it by saying that tomorrow we of the Foreign Relations Committee are going to have the privilege of catechizing the Secretary and getting his views and interpretations as to the subject known as the foreign policy in the Far East. I should like to have the distinguished Senator state very briefly—perhaps it will be by way of recapitulation; I do not know—if he were Secretary of State, or President, what policy he would initiate on behalf of this Government in the Far East, from here on in, or from here on out. In other words, we have as it were a patient. What is the remedy the Senator would prescribe? I should like to have a categorical reply. First, I understood the Senator would not recognize the Communists.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. That is correct.

Mr. WILEY. Second, I understand that, in relation to Formosa, instead of occupying it, the Senator would provide some sort of economic aid, so that the present forces themselves could effectively handle the situation. Is that correct?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I recommend that we think in terms of keeping Formosa from getting into any hands hostile to the United States. In my discussion today, which was built around my thought about Formosa, I explored four alternative approaches, which will appear in the RECORD.

Mr. WILEY. I understand. Which one would the Senator suggest?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. The last one was the one I suggested.

Mr. WILEY. And what was that?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. It was on the theory that we had a responsibility, because Formosa legally is still a part of Japan.

Mr. WILEY. I understand. What was the last one, briefly?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I preferred to have an arrangement with the Nationalists and the Formosan people, which I think they would be very glad to sit in with us to work out, for the peaceful occupation of the island, the development of its economics, and so forth. I realize that if we did that at this time and the word was being carried over the island, it would make complications in which our people would not want to become involved. We are not willing to give any military aid or take any aggressive action; so I limited the suggestion by saying there should be no aggressive warfare carried on from Formosa by the Nationalists or anyone else. If they wanted to carry on aggressive warfare, they must go to some other base, but we would be prepared to back them up in the defense of Formosa against its being taken over by hostile hands.

Mr. WILEY. But does the plan contemplate a partial trusteeship or a partial occupancy by this Government?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. An occupancy in the sense of a peaceful occupancy because of our responsibility to Taiwan's people, until the Japanese peace treaty is signed.

Mr. WILEY. Does that mean that we would have to put military forces in possession?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. No; I should not put a soldier in there.

Mr. WILEY. What does the Senator mean then by occupation?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. We would have no trouble at all about that, because we have bases in Japan, we have bases in Okinawa, and we have a base in Manila, which could be used, if they had to be, and, as I tried to explain in my statement, I would recommend a peaceful occupation so as to set up a democratic government, to make a symbolic Chinese province there on a democratic basis, by getting the people who were interested in its future—who would be the Nationalists, the Formosans, and so on—to work with us. Either we would be there joining them in the Government, or preferably, we would be advising and helping them to set up a democratic government of their own. But we would protect them against being taken over by the Communists.

Mr. WILEY. Then, am I to understand by occupancy that the Senator means something of the sort of occupancy that occurred in Greece, to which we sent advisers and a few military officers?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. No; I would not even go so far as that. I would not send a military man. I would have nothing to do with the military end, at all. I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. WILEY. The Senator has in mind, then, merely some political advisers?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Political advisers, or whatever they might want to have.

Mr. WILEY. Then, would the Senator enter into an arrangement whereby, if there were a joint set-up, if they were attacked, we would be at war?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. No; we would not be at war.

Mr. WILEY. We would be making a guaranty?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. No; I am not proposing to guarantee anything. I am saying we would back them up, if they were attacked from the mainland, but we would not be at war in any aggressive sense.

Mr. WILEY. What does the Senator mean by the expression "backing them up"?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. It would be in the sense that, if necessary, as former President Hoover said, our Navy should be used to prevent Formosa's being taken over; the sense in which the suggestion was made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] that our Navy might be used to prevent its being taken over; not that we would get into an active war at all; but simply take such action if the contingency mentioned should happen. I do not think it would happen under the program I have proposed, because we would not be putting any military force there, or any military mission. I have no interest in that. I am interested in turning our attention to ideological warfare, and in my own expression, moving from a hot shooting war to a cold war, with the minds of men as our chief objective in setting up this picture in Formosa.

Mr. WILEY. First, there is no recognition of Communists.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. No.

Mr. WILEY. Second, the Senator has in mind some kind of joint arrangement to give some political form of government to Formosa, with the idea of a protectorate, so that we would protect them in case they were attacked?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Let us use that expression.

Mr. WILEY. Very well; we can use that. Is there anything else in the Senator's policy? Would there be any economic advancement of any kind? I should like to find out concretely.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. There would probably be the working out of an ECA program for developing the island, since the President in writing off Formosa has approved that. We should continue to give them ECA aid. I think that is legitimate, and we should continue it.

Mr. WILEY. But in the present situation in the Far East—and I do not want to be facetious—I think it is plainly evident that either the Nationalist Government has to be competent militarily to resist attack, or have some assistance from an outside power that will give it that competency. I now come to the other question: Would the Senator see to it that they were given assistance in the nature of military aid?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Not in the first instance; not in setting up this picture, as I visualize it. I think it will take the Communists at least 6 months to get moving in that direction. If it appears they are moving in that direction, we shall be faced with the question then of a possible threat to our island defenses, and we shall have had a chance to consult our boards of strategy and our Joint Chiefs of Staff as to what we should do in that case. What would we do tomorrow if the Communists tried to take one of the Japanese islands? Suppose the Communists tried to take one of the Japanese islands under General MacArthur's care. I say that Formosa should be under the same kind of care that MacArthur exercises with respect to the Japanese against any foreign assault.

Mr. WILEY. Then, the Senator would recommend sending military advisers there to lay out some adequate plan?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I personally do not think it necessary.

Mr. WILEY. I thought the Senator said something about following the judgment of the Chiefs of Staff.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. For our own guidance as to whether we should move in, as President Hoover suggested, with the Navy, or as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] suggested.

Mr. WILEY. Is there any other facet to the Senator's policy?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Yes. If the distinguished Senator by any chance, who is a member of the committee, read my report to the committee, it goes into other matters with which I did not deal today.

Mr. WILEY. Were they matters dealing with the question of policy?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Yes; I went into the question of our far-eastern policy, because I said we must have a unified over-all finger on the pulse, which we do not have today. We have MacArthur in Japan, taking care of the island, and the Navy taking care of the mainland, and while they work beautifully, it is not a unified command over the whole. Personally I should like to see MacArthur in charge of the whole area.

Mr. WILEY. That is what the Senator means by keeping a finger on the pulse?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. WILEY. MacArthur over all?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I should like to see that.

Mr. WILEY. That is another point.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. It does raise some difficulties, because he is what is called SCAP, the Supreme Commander of the Allied Powers in that area, and he might be ineligible. But I have discussed with the Secretary of State the possibility of having what might be called an ambassador at large, going down into French Indochina, to Siam, to Burma, to Malay, and to Indonesia to deal with all the issues which will come up in the Far East. They ought to be under one hat, so we can deal with one head and not have them under scattered commands. I think it is most important.

Mr. WILEY. Assuming we had in Formosa the set-up the Senator suggests and it became evident that it would be the wise thing to see to it that the roving Nationalist bands in China, the guerrillas, should receive adequate arms, the Senator would recommend that arms be given to them?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. No, we would be entirely out of that.

Mr. WILEY. The Senator would not have anything to do with that?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. We should have nothing to do with that, under the approach I am making to this problem.

Mr. WILEY. I thought the Senator said something about other places, Burma, and so on.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. In Burma, Indochina, and Siam, there is the problem of uprisings.

Mr. WILEY. The problem of containing the Communists?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. WILEY. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. There is a $75,000,000 flexible fund which the President was given through the legislation enacted last year. I recommended in my report where that was to be used. It might be used for spots in China, as well as Indochina, or somewhere else, but I am not raising in connection with the Formosan question, the spots in which it ought to be used. In my judgment that question ought to be determined by men of the caliber of MacArthur, Wedemeyer, Badger, Berkey, both military and naval officers who are on the ground, and who are constantly studying the problems involved. I am told they are being asked for their advice, but there is not a follow-up of anything.

Mr. WILEY. But if the policy recommended by the Senator contemplates that this over-all group of master-minds felt that to contain the Communists it was necessary that this fund be used to procure arms to be furnished the guerrillas so that they could make constant opposition to the onrush of the Communists, that would be a part of the plan, would it?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I think it would be, yes. In answering the Senator's question, and before I yield the floor, I should like to add a further word. Another recommendation I made in my report was that a committee of three, composed of Jessup, Fosdick, and Case be continued, and that there be added an advisory group made up members of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House, and the Armed Services Committees of both bodies, to keep in constant touch with this rapidly developing situation. I recommended that a subcommittee of that joint group, which should have the responsibility, should go to that area immediately to see whether those who have come back from there have reported the truth, or whether we are merely alarmists, as we are accused in some quarters of being, and whether there is really such a critical situation there as may bring about a world crisis at almost any time. I feel that strongly about it. I think we ought not to be caught unprepared.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one question?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from New Jersey suggests that we should not, under any circumstances, recognize the Communist regime in China. From what the Senator understands is taking place in both countries at the present time, is there any difference between being a Communist in China and being a Communist in Russia?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Frankly, I think there is very little, if any, difference. I think the pattern in China is exactly the same as that in Czechoslovakia and in all other places where the turn-over comes through infiltration without an aggressive conquest. I am sure the Senator from Illinois would not be even considering recognition if Russia had conquered China and had said, "We are de facto conquerers and want to be recognized."

Mr. LUCAS. Would the Senator suggest that we withdraw recognition from other Communist nations?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. We may have to do so. Certainly if there should be a continuation of what is now going on in Hungary, where they have taken an American citizen and have declined to account for him, we must either act very forcefully or sever all relations with that nation.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not at all disagree with the position of the Senator so far as individual American citizens are concerned, but I am speaking solely with regard to the ideology of communism and whether we should recognize communism in one place and fail to recognize it in another place. That is the only point I make. I presume, from the Senator's argument as to refusing recognition of Communist China, he would be willing to withdraw recogition from other Communist countries.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I think we may be faced with that situation. At the time when we were considering recognition, for example, of the Communist regime of Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Bulgaria, and other countries, I yielded to the argument that it might be better to recognize them and have some observers behind the iron curtain than to be kept out entirely. But as I have seen the situation progress and have seen the implications of the Chinese picture indicating communism for all Asia, I do not want the United States to be in the position of saying, "We cannot help it, so we are going to leave it."

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one further question?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I shall be happy to yield.

Mr. LUCAS. In the colloquy which the able Senator had with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], the Senator from New Jersey went so far as to say, as I understood him, that if it should be necessary ultimately to defend Formosa from domination by the Chinese Communists, he would agree with former President Hoover and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] that the American Fleet should be used to try to forestall the conquering of Formosa by the Chinese Communists. Is that a fair statement of what the Senator said?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. No. What I tried to say was that I felt it was the defensive side which former President Hoover and the Senator from Ohio had in mind. I wish the Senator from Ohio were here at this time. No aggressive war against the Communists would be carried on from Formosa. I want to take it out of the war and give the people a chance to recover as an active Chinese province, protecting the people who are the victims of the fight on both sides.

Mr. LUCAS. I certainly agree with the Senator that we do not want to carry on any aggressive war, but I fear that if we surround Formosa with our fleet or go into Formosa with any troops, we shall be charged with an act of war.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I would not send a single soldier there. I do not want any soldiers there at all. I take the position that General MacArthur today is the trustee for Japan, to keep Japan from any aggressions from an outside source. We certainly would move our troops into Japan in case Japan were threatened. I would put Formosa in the same classification until the peace treaty is signed.

Mr. LUCAS. A number of other Senators may differ with the distinguished Senator from New Jersey, that they are in the same classification.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am not saying it is not a controversial question.

Mr. LUCAS. I think it is a very interesting question and one with which the American people are vitally concerned, as to how far Members of the Senate are willing to go in the way of sending our Navy to Formosa to defend it from the onrushing of the Communists of China, and how far we are willing to go in sending troops there. My own position is that we cannot be fooling around with our Navy over in the Pacific and getting ready to defend Formosa from the onrushing of the Communists across the sea without having a little more than the Navy to help take care of the situation.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Let me say to the distinguished Senator that the Secretary of State, in his introduction to the white paper, says distinctly that if the Chinese Communists move over the borders of China, they will have to reckon with the United States. I ask the Senator from Illinois, as representing the administration, where are we going to stop? Formosa is an ideal place to stop. We cannot stop at the Indonesian border, the China border, or at Burma, without sending in troops. Formosa is an ideal place to stop.

Mr. LUCAS. That, again, brings up the question as to what is the border, whether Formosa is a part of China, or whether it would be after the treaty is signed. I seriously doubt whether we should undertake a trusteeship, as the Senator suggests. Certainly we could not do it under the United Nations.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I said in my remarks that that was impracticable, and I threw it out. I said it might be desirable to explore the question, but that it did not seem to me to be practicable, because Russia would veto it. But there is a point which the administration must decide as to what we are going to do with the funds. Are we going to dribble them out to help the local armies? We shall lose Asia if we do not decide where to stop.

Mr. LUCAS. That may be correct. The Senator from Illinois is just as desirous of stopping communism at the borders as is any other Senator. The Senator from Illinois has always seen eye to eye with the Senator from New Jersey in the foreign policy of this country in the European sector of the world. But I cannot follow the argument being made by my distinguished friends as to the foreign policy they suggest with respect to the Asiatic situation. I cannot go that far. I do not question any Senator's sincerity. I know my friend from New Jersey has been in the Far East and has spent a considerable amount of time in talking to persons there and trying to ascertain for his own benefit and for the benefit of the Senate and the country the situation. He has made a very interesting address, but I cannot quite go along with my friend, because I am definitely afraid that the charge of imperialism which will be hurled at us may be sustained if we follow the policy laid down by former President Hoover and by my distinguished colleague from Ohio [Mr. TAFT.]

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I do not think we are going to get to that point, because I do not believe the Communists will dare to take the initiative in such aggression if we take the proper position.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, the able Senator from Illinois has stated a situation which I think is a pertinent one, and I greatly respect him, as the majority leader knows. I desire to call his attention to the letter of transmittal by Dean Acheson in connection with the white paper, in which this language appears:

> Should the Communist regime lend itself to the aims of Soviet Russian imperialism and attempt to engage in aggression against Chinese neighbors, we and other members of the United Nations would be confronted by a situation violative of the principles of the United Nations Charter and threatening international peace and security.

If we take the words of the Secretary to mean what he apparently means, they would apply to any Communist aggression across the borders of Indochina or Burma, or, presumably, the borders of the Republic of Korea, which would be immediately of concern to us as one of the law-abiding nations of the world, and we would be called upon to send a fleet and our armed forces, or our air forces, as the case might necessitate, to protect from aggression. Can the Senator from Illinois read anything else into that statement by the Secretary of State?

Mr. LUCAS. I do not care to read anything into the statement made by the Secretary of State with respect to what he said last year. I have not examined what he said. I should want to read the whole content of the statement before I gave a definite conclusion as to what he meant in any particular paragraph. It was written last May, I think the Senator said, before the Chinese Communists had the great victories in their own country in the civil war which they have been carrying on. But the State Department takes the position that Formosa is a part of China. If that is the position they take, I imagine the civil war could continue on into Formosa. What will happen if the Communists go into Malay and Indonesia is an entirely different question. We will meet that problem when it arises. Now we are talking about Formosa, and Formosa alone.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I might say to the able Senator from Illinois, because we have on many issues seen eye to eye together, I think this is a very pertinent question, to which the American Senate and the public and the Congress must give some attention. In view of the position we have now taken in China, of turning our back on a wartime ally and friend, and saying that because it is a civil disturbance, albeit one inspired by international communism, we cannot become involved in a civil war, and therefore say, "We write you off." What is that going to put into the minds of the people of Korea, who are sitting under the gun? What is that going to put into the minds of the people of Indochina, or Burma, or Siam, or Pakistan, or India?

The great danger the world faces today is not that a Soviet Army may move across the border, or that a Chinese Communist Army may move across the border, but suppose they multiply 10 times the situation with which we were faced in Greece, and begin to infiltrate arms and infiltrate agitators and stir up dissension, and one by one take the nations of Asia behind the iron curtain? That will be just as effective, in the long run, as though an army went across the borders and occupied the countries. So I say very sincerely to the Senator from Illinois, unless we are "kidding" these free people in that part of the world, sooner or later someone will have to make up his mind as to whether freedom is any less important in Asia than it is in Europe.

I think that if the Communists moved across the border into Turkey or into Greece there would be a situation which would be very easy for the American people to understand, namely, that an aggression had taken place. But what happens if the Communists do as they did in Greece, and attempt to take the country from within? In that nation our answer was that we would get into the civil war situation, because we recognized that international communism was an international conspiracy. We did inject ourselves into the situation in order to prevent the people of Greece from being taken behind the iron curtain from within.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, it is a rather long and involved question the Senator has asked, if it was a question. But in response primarily to the statement he made, I should like to make merely one reply. I think the agitation which is going on now with respect to what we ought to do in the Far East, in view of the definite policy which has been laid down by the State Department, is serving no useful purpose, so far as helping the eastern situation is concerned.

Speaking of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, if the leadership of China had followed the directions of the military leadership of General Marshall when he was there, as the Koreans have done in the northern section of the area, they would not be in the position today in which they find themselves.

The point I make is that we spent pretty close to $3,000,000,000 there in an effort to help the Nationalist Government, and what happened to the money everyone knows. That Government simply did not perform. It did not follow orders as they were followed in Greece and in Turkey, in France and in Italy, where we have had military missions helping out. They would not take orders from Marshall or anyone else. They were going to do as they pleased, and they did so, and they came to their ruination and downfall.

I have not too much sympathy with the Generalissimo at present, if the Senator desires to know my personal feelings, because of his failure to follow the instructions laid down by the best military men of this country, including Marshall, Wedemeyer, Barr, and others who were on the scene trying to give aid and comfort to those people when they desperately needed it, but they failed to follow the orders.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. First, let me say one word in answer to the Senator from Illinois The Senator from Illinois mentioned General Wedemeyer. We did not follow the Wedemeyer recommendations, and there was no issue with the Generalissimo about his recommendations. I do not care to go into that, because it is a very controversial subject, but I will say to the Senator from Illinois, with my great regard for him, with his brilliant mind and his ability to dig into things, that I only wish he could have been with me on my trip, because I know he would have had a contribution to make in this debate, which one cannot make who has not been on the scene. A breadth of view is acquired by talking with people on both sides of the controversy. There are many on the same side the Senator occupies. There is a breadth of view which many in this body should attain if we are to solve this problem to the satisfaction of the American people. What I regret is that there are too many people having to do with the matter in Washington who have not been in the Far East. It has been a very difficult situation, and in trying to solve the problem, I hope we can work it out on some kind of intelligent basis.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I now yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Is it the Senator's understanding that the Nationalist Government of China is still the de jure government of China, recognized by the United States?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. It is at this moment, yes.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Then Formosa is still under the control of the recognized government of China?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. That is correct. That is why in my recommendation I said we ought to deal with that Government and with the Taiwan people.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. One step further. The Government of China which we recognize today, and which is in control of Formosa, has requested aid from us by way of military advice and supplies, and matters of that kind.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Does the Senator see any difference whatsoever in the legal status, so far as the international situation is concerned, between the situation in Formosa, where the legally constituted government, which was recognized by this country, is requesting aid and advice and certain equipment from us, and the situation which existed in Greece and Turkey, when the excuse used by the administration—and I voted for the policy—for going into Greece and Turkey with advice and missions and certain equipment, was that the legally constituted, recognized governments of those two countries were requesting that aid, and that we had a perfect right, under international law, to go in with the aid and suppress the Communist uprising? Does the Senator see any substantial difference in principle between those two situations?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Not in the situation in which we are. Of course, as I have tried to point out, there is some little doubt as to the exact legal status of Formosa today; that is, as to whether it is Chinese territory with the Nationalist Government as it is, or whether that matter is still in abeyance, somewhat, because the Japanese peace treaty has not been signed. With that qualification, I would say the Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. We are facing a dilemma. Either Formosa is a part of China or it is still part of the territory that we took from Japan, the status of which has not been finally and completely settled, so far as international recognition is concerned, as a result of any peace treaty being made.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. That is correct.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. So that we either deal with it as an ally, or the ward of some nation, until its status has been determined as a result of a Japanese peace treaty, or we deal with it as a part of China. If we deal with it as a part of China, then the recognized Government of China has control of it and has troops there.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I think it was United States troops that liberated it, I think there is no dispute about that, and if we deal with it as the ward of either the Allies or some other group, then the revolutionary government in China should keep out of it, for that reason. I mean, their status should not be recognized, and perhaps we would have some obligation to preserve its integrity until it is finally settled legally.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am concerned about the 7,000,000 people who are interested and who are to be sacrificed unless something is done to protect them, and who are entitled to be protected.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I should like to ask the Senator one more question if he will yield.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Did the Senator make up his mind as to whether there was any ethnic difference between the people of Formosa and the people on the mainland—in China? In other words, are they the same people, or are they a substantially different people in the matter of race, culture, and background?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I would not say that they are substantially different. They have a background, of course, very much the same, but they have been independent of, or away from China so long, under Japanese control, that there has been intermarriage with Japanese. Of course, there is much business back and forth between the mainland and Formosa, which has brought the people together, and probably there is considerable intermixture. But fundamentally the Taiwanians think at least that they are not the same as the Chinese. As I said earlier today, I am receiving petitions from different groups which are urging that the United Nations take steps to secure for the Taiwanians independence from either of the warring groups. I do not believe the movement to be a strong one, but I think we have some responsibility along that line, in view of the fact that Taiwan was a conquered Japanese territory.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The Senator from New Jersey has looked into this matter more carefully than I have, and I should like to ask him this question: Does the Senator understand that Formosa was ceded to Japan by China about 50 years ago, as the result of a peace treaty?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I think it was ceded to Japan by the peace treaty following the Sino-Japanese War of 1895.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. So that so far as international recognition is concerned, Japan obtained title to Formosa and ownership to Formosa as a result of cession?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. And during this period of time Formosa has been a part of Japan, either as a colony or in some other way?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. It has been completely under Japanese authority?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. The people of Formosa were treated as a subjugated people.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. But so far as international law is concerned, Formosa was recognized as having been transferred to Japan as the result of the settlement of the Sino-Japanese War?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. By conquest.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. So that Formosa, then, actually is a country which was legally the property of Japan under international law until the surrender of Japan at the end of World War II?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. That is correct.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. And Formosa then is still actually in a rather uncertain status because there has been no peace treaty and no final agreement among the Allies and the Japanese nation?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I may say to the Senator that there was an agreement at Cairo, to which we were a party, which did not cover all the countries concerned, but it did cover us; we agreed at that time that after the defeat of Japan one of the conditions of the peace would be the return of Formosa to China.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Who agreed to that? Did that ever come before the Senate of the United States as a treaty, or has it ever come before the Congress as an agreement?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I do not think it came before the Senate. I have the text of the agreement. It was read by the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] during his address last Thursday. The Senator then said:

> The Cairo declaration of September 1, 1943, had this to say—
>
> With regard to Formosa—
> Japan shall be stripped of all the islands in the Pacific which she has seized or occupied since the beginning of the First World War in 1914, and * * * all the territories Japan has stolen from the Chinese such as Manchuria, Formosa, and the Pescadores, shall be restored to the Republic of China.

Because of that we cooperated in letting the National Government of China move into Formosa after the war was over, but before the peace treaty was signed.

The query now is: Legally has Formosa now moved into the Chinese Republic classification which the Cairo declaration calls for, or will it have to await the signing of the peace treaty? I say it will have to await the signing of the peace treaty, and that therefore we have a responsibility we cannot legally avoid.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. The agreements at Cairo probably are more in the nature of proposals than of binding agreements. Does the Senator believe that the proposals at Cairo are per se binding on this country, without having been submitted as treaties, or perhaps, I should say, without having been submitted in international agreement form?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I have been trying to secure the full text of the Cairo declaration. I do not think I can answer the distinguished Senator's question. It is possible the Senator from California can do so. The Senator from California placed in the RECORD the matter I just read, which makes it clear that we had at least committed ourselves to this kind of an adjustment. Whether, as the Senator suggests, that commitment ought to be ratified by the Senate, I will say that I think it probably should in the final Japanese peace treaty that will come to us some day for ratification. It will contain this provision. I have maintained that all along. I do not think the declaration is legal until we have ratified it.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I should like to ask the Senator a question based on a point raised by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] a moment ago. The Senator from Illinois expressed great apprehension of what would happen if we were to send war vessels to the waters around Formosa. Is it not true that we did not hesitate to send aircraft carriers and destroyers and other war vessels into the Adriatic when there was some tension between Yugoslavia and Italy? Is it not true that we did not hesitate to send war vessels, including carriers into Grecian waters and Turkish waters when there was some need for reassurance to those countries of our program there? Does the Senator agree that we did so on those two occasions?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. There are many instances in our history when we did that very thing.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I will say that I am not advocating the sending of armed forces to Formosa. I believe the Formosan people and the Chinese can take care of their own affairs without the necessity of our sending armed forces there to work out their problems for them.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. That is in line with what I suggested earlier today.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Will the Senator indulge me for one more moment for an observation in the nature of a question?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Reference was made a moment ago to the fact that we did not follow the advice of General Marshall and General Wedemeyer. I believe the Senator from Illinois made that suggestion. The Senator from New Jersey very properly pointed out immediately that we did not follow the advice of General Wedemeyer because we did not know what that advice was in the first place, so far as the Congress was concerned. I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that had we followed the advice of General Marshall, or adopted the program he proposed while over there, we would have had a Communist government in China long since, because, as I understand, his efforts were directed toward bringing Communists into the National Government of China.

The history of every nation, so far as I know, which has opened the door to let in Communist members to its government, is that it has found before very long that the camel, having gotton its nose under the tent, eventually has crowded out the occupants of the tent and made the government completely communistic government by capture.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I will say that is the technique of the Russian method of conquest. I consider that the Chinese situation today is a conquest by Russia through her new, very clever technique.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. But I am speaking of the proposal that General Marshall advanced in China. If there is a policy in China by the administration that seems to be the policy that has been turning over great segments of the government for the past several years to Communist dominion by way of Communist deputies and Communist members of the Chinese Government. But if we can rely on experience of the countries in eastern Europe, where the policy has been followed of allowing Communists to infiltrate into important positions in government, we are justified in believing that had such a policy been followed in China the Chinese Nationalist Government would have been completely captured by the Communists long before this.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I agree. I think the record shows that to be so.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. I merely wish to address a question to the distinguished majority leader the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS]. In view of the importance of the pending legislation, that is the legislation respecting oleo, which is so close to the heart of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], I understand it is the intention of the administration leaders to hold the Senate in session for a night session until final action is taken on that legislation. Is that correct?

Mr. LUCAS. In reply to my friend the Senator from New Hampshire I will say that he is not correct. I know the Senator from Wisconsin would like to have the Senate stay in session tonight and vote on the unfinished business. Some Members of the Senate, however, have arranged for a dinner tonight, so obviously we cannot have a night session.

Mr. TOBEY. I regret very much to hear the Senator say that, in view of the feelings of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. This is the first time I have known that the Senator's feelings toward me were so tender.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I shall consume very little time of the Senate. The debate respecting the island of Formosa has covered almost every aspect of foreign policy during recent years. The Senator from New Jersey made a very interesting speech concerning his travels, and his conferences with General MacArthur and his conferences with Chiang Kai-shek, and his conferences with various other individuals, with Formosans, and with Chinese. I cannot understand how he could have had so many conferences with so many individuals in the short time he was in the Far East.

Mr. President, one of the amazing things about travel is that a Senator or a Representative can go to a foreign country and within a week or 10 days come back with more information than had ever before been gathered respecting such foreign country or that had been theretofore known to exist respecting the particular nation.

I am at a loss to know what those who are complaining about Formosa want to do about it. I want to know what they think the policy ought to be. The Senator from New Jersey says he does not want to send a single soldier to Formosa. Yet, I hold in my hand a newspaper account, coming from New Brunswick, N. J., on January 3. It is headed: "Aggressive policy asked."

This is the newspaper statement; I shall quote the Senator from New Jersey later. I read further from the newspaper account:

> This country should lose no time in adopting an aggressive policy in the Far East, including the occupation of Formosa—

Occupation, Mr. President—an aggressive policy! "Go in and occupy it, regardless of the consequences. We want some aggression!"

I read further:

> An aggressive policy, including the occupation of Formosa, to forestall a possible Communist sweep southward, out of China, Senator ALEXANDER SMITH (Republican), of New Jersey, a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, declared tonight in a recorded broadcast.

That was not any ad lib speech, but it was a recorded broadcast. The record is available in the radio station; they have the words of the Senator from New Jersey, in which he said he wants us to occupy Formosa.

How are we going to occupy it if we do not send an army there? We cannot occupy it with a few tourists; we cannot occupy it with the two or three Senators who went there, who, at the firing of the first gun, would go into a hole somewhere. [Laughter.] We cannot occupy it with them; neither can we occupy it with the few Members of Congress who visit there.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONG in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not yield at the moment.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I wanted to observe that one of the Senators who went there did not crawl into a hole in World War II.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have a high regard for the Senator. I was not personalizing the Senators who went there. I am talking about any Senator who went there. He would be a fool if he did not go into a hole. [Laughter.]

Senators talk about having us go there and intervene in a civil war in Formosa. I said when the shooting started, they would go into a hole, and I repeat it. If I were over there, that is exactly where I would go. [Laughter.] I would not want to shed my blood to determine a civil war in Formosa, in which the United States has no direct interest.

So that is that. I apologize to the Senator from California; I had no personal reference to him. I know of his fine war record, and I admire it, and I pay my tribute to it. But I was merely discussing the general proposition of tourists and Senators.

Here is where the Senator from New Jersey himself begins to talk; this is his own language, as quoted by the New Brunswick newspaper:

> I am hoping we will find a formula—

Mr. President, whenever a man undertakes to find a formula, he usually finds one, but he has usually had it in his pocket all the time. Yes, find a formula. I read further:

> I am hoping we will find a formula for occupying Formosa.

Occupy it, Mr. President. What does "occupy" mean? Everyone knows what the word "occupy," as used in the English language means. It means to seize it, to take it, to sit down there and boss it and govern it and control it.

I read further:

> "I am hoping we will find a formula for occupying Formosa," said Mr. Smith. "I think it would be very simple to work out a program with the Nationalist Government there and with the Formosan people, themselves, whereby we would go into a joint occupation and help them to recover."

Going to occupy it, Mr. President. That was the Senator's view when he made that statement. But today he would not send a single soldier there. I want to ask Senators who have been so eloquent on the floor, where is the Senator who now favors sending an army to Formosa? If such there be, let them rise; I yield to permit their answer. Is there any Member of the Senate who wishes to send an army to Formosa? Mr. Hoover wants to send the Navy there. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], so the newspapers say, wants to send the Navy there. But they do not have a single spokesman on the floor of this body who will rise and tell the Senate and the country that, "I favor sending an army to Formosa."

What do they want to send an army there for? They want to occupy it; they want to take over Formosa. They would say, "According to my formula, in the final analysis we want to intervene in the civil war; we want to run the chance of a war; we want to run the risk of a third world war, on account of Formosa."

The testimony is, as best I can get it, that the Formosans do not want either one of these groups in control. They do not want the Communists; they do not want the Nationalists. They want to be left alone. Yet all the gentlemen who are looking for formulas—every one of them—want to occupy Formosa: Mr. Hoover, with the Navy; the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], on the other side of the island with another navy; and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] wants to occupy it, although I do not know with what he would occupy it, except with oratory and with conferences.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; I yield. Of course, there has been so much yielding this afternoon that I have been waiting all afternoon to get rid of yielding. But I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Inasmuch as the Senator has made some statements, I am sure, of course, that he wishes to be accurate in his statements on the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. I should like to be accurate off the floor, too.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Well, off the floor, too.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not make any bones about being accurate only on the floor.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The junior Senator from California has not advocated sending American troops to occupy Formosa. In that respect, I disagree with other points of view.

I have suggested that it is of concern to the people of the United States that the free people of Asia not be taken behind the iron curtain; and I have advocated that assistance should be given to the legal Government of China to defend their islands of Formosa and Hainan in the same way that we have given military assistance to the legal Government of Greece, and as we are today giving assistance to the Government of Greece, and as today we are giving assistance to the Government of Korea, which also is subject to Communist pressure.

I think that if the Government of China receives such help in its bastions of Formosa and Hainan, it can defend its own islands. I am sure the able Senator from Texas recognizes the fact that under our treaty obligations and under the United Nations obligations, if there is aggression against the Atlantic Pact nations, we are going to have to go to their defense. I do not think liberty and freedom are any less important to the people of Korea and the free people of China than they are to the people of Austria or France or of Belgium.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well.

Mr. President, the Senator has adverted to our obligations to help China defend itself. Senators here on this floor today have said that we have had no policy in Asia, and that we have never had any policy in China. That is a slander upon the record of this Government; it is a slander upon the record of the Senate. What did we do when China was beleaguered by the Communist uprising, by this civil war? We called in Gen. Chiang Kai-shek and said to him, "It is true that we have no policy regarding China, but here is $3,000,000,000. Take this $3,000,000,000, wrung from the taxpayers of the United States by law, and provide yourself with arms and with resources in resisting the attacks of the Communist hordes."

What went with many of those arms? The reports from our own military officers—I heard one of them, a general, testify to that effect—are, "No battle was lost by the Chinese Nationalists because of a lack of arms or of munitions or of supplies." He said, "Those battles were lost because they did not want to fight."

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. CONNALLY. I hope the Senator will permit me to conclude.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Let me say that I hope this will be the last interruption.

Mr. CONNALLY. Can the Senator from California speak for his entire side of the Senate? The hour is growing late, and I wish to conclude. However, I will yield. The Senator from California has had the floor half the time today, by being yielded to. He forced the Senator from New Jersey to yield to him a great deal. Nevertheless, let him go ahead now.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The freedom of 400,000,000 people is involved, so I think we are warranted in taking a little time to discuss the question.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not think the Senator's speech will determine that.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Perhaps it will not; but at least the public is entitled to some information.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I should like to have the Senator from Texas—and I say this in all sincerity—through his staff on the Foreign Relations Committee, present for the RECORD a break-down of the so-called $3,000,000,000 to which he has referred, which he says has been given to the Nationalist Government of China since the civil war started, subsequent to VJ-day.

The fact of the matter is that the most recent publication——

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, has the Senator from California asked the question he had in mind?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I simply wish to give the Senator the figures.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let the Senator ask a question; let him not make a speech in my time. The Senator from California has been speaking half the day thus far. Let him go ahead and ask the question.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Very well. The figures I now ask to be put into the RECORD, Mr. President, were furnished by the Department of Commerce of the United States, and they show that the amount received by China has been $1,774,000,000 since VJ-day, which is not $3,000,000,000. At the proper time I shall show that that includes a great deal of surplus equipment charged at original cost, whereas the British figures are drawn up on the basis of 10 cents on the dollar. In contrast to the amount furnished China, the United Kingdom has received $6,247,000,000.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire list which I now hold in my hand be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Total grants	$28,171,000,000
Less amount paid to International Bank monetary fund	3,385,000,000
	24,786,000,000
Subtotal for ERP participants	17,651,000,000
United Kingdom	6,247,000,000
Germany	2,438,000,000
France	3,487,000,000
Netherlands	823,000,000
Italy	1,786,000,000
Greece	1,036,000,000
Belgium-Luxemburg	485,000,000
Austria	604,000,000
Turkey	164,000,000
Denmark	137,000,000
Norway	163,000,000
Others, including unallocated ERP	297,000,000
Other, Europe	1,581,000,000
American Republics	380,000,000
Japan	1,622,000,000
Philippines	521,000,000
China	1,774,000,000
International organizations	619,000,000

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, considering the vast knowledge the Senator from California possesses and the information possessed by his staff and as a result of his researches, I do not think I am called upon to give him the figures. As a matter of fact, the record shows that since 1937 we have given China slightly more than $3,500,000,000. In addition, China has received surplus property which has had a procurement value in excess of $1,000,000,000. Our total assistance to China since VJ-day has been between $2,000,000,000 and $2,500,000,000. I make that statement in defending the administration against the charge that we have had no policy in China. We had the policy of aiding China. We had the policy of pouring out our treasure, extorted from the taxpayers of the United States, many of whom were in worse condition than some of the Chinese. Yet it is said we have no policy there. We called in Chiang Kai-shek and said, "Mr. Chiang, we want to give you some arms. We want to give you some munitions. We want to give you some supplies in order that you may carry on your resistance to the Communists who are attacking you." Yet it is said we have no policy. It is said we have no policy in Asia except the policy of giving and giving. Yet we sent General Marshall to China, who remained there over a year. He had no ambitions in China. He went at the behest of the President of the United States to try to work out peace and stability in China. Did Chiang Kai-shek follow his suggestions or advice? He did not. He had no policy in China except the policy of building up the ambitions of Chiang Kai-shek. We had the policy there of composing differences, of stopping war, of bringing about peace and stability in that great area.

We have been a friend of China throughout all the years. We gave up our extraterritorial claims there. We have given extensive loans, through the RFC and other agencies, millions upon millions of dollars, to aid the Chinese, and yet Senators say on the floor of the Senate we have had no policy in Asia, we have had no policy in China. What have we had? We did not give money to anyone else in that area as we poured it out in China.

What became of the arms? Our troops, when they got up into the northern areas, found Communist armies with United States guns in their hands, guns that our money had purchased. They found in possession of the Communists dumps of ammunition and supplies which our money had purchased. Yet it is said we have had no policy and have not tried to aid Asia. What kind of aid was it that permitted these supplies and these arms to be found in the hands of the enemies of the Chinese people?

Mr. President, some of us are becoming rather weary of the repeated charge that we have had no foreign policy, that we have had none in China, and that we have had none in Asia. Yet there is not a Senator on the floor who says he would vote to send an army to Formosa. What do we want to send to Formosa? What should we send, if not an army? It is impossible to whip the Communists with wind. It would be necessary to send men with guns in their hands, supported by aircraft and artillery and all the ordnance of war. That is what would be necessary. And what would that mean? If we intervene, if we go in with arms in our hands it would mean that we might be plunged into world war III.

Mr. President, I am sorry for the people of Formosa. I am sorry for the people of China. I am sorry for Asiatic peoples, but I am not so sorry for them as I would be for the widows that a war would leave in the United States. I love American boys and American mothers and American fathers more than I love the people of Formosa and more than I love the people of China. I am not in favor of casting a single vote that may risk plunging this country into world war III and the sending of bright-faced American boys to die in the jungles of Formosa.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to point out to the able Senator from Texas that our Navy consists not alone of ships and sailors. The marines are well trained in amphibious landing. The Navy also has aviation. Thus the Navy has in effect the Army in the form of the marines, the Air Force in the form of naval aviation, and the Navy proper in the form of ships and guns. So I should like to have someone who advocates the Navy's being sent to Formosa tell me what the Navy is to do after it arrives at Formosa.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am sorry to say I have not had an opportunity to contact ex-President Hoover or the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] as to what they meant by the reference to the Navy. President Hoover was quoted in the press as saying he wanted to send the Navy, and he wanted to build up in Formosa a wall against communism with the Navy, with the marines, with aviation, and with all the components of the Naval Establishment. I do not want to do that. I am not going to vote to do it. The American people do not want it done. They do not want us to send an army to Formosa to intervene in a civil war between two Chinese factions, the factions of Chiang Kai-shek and of the Communist Government of China, which has already been recognized by five or six of the nations of the earth.

What the Senator from New Jersey meant by joint occupation I do not know. We would not get very far with joint occupation with Chiang Kai-shek. He would either run the outfit or he would not play, that is all. Joint occupation. We cannot have a joint occupation. If there is a military force, it is necessary to have someone at the head of it, a general, an admiral, or a director of the military force.

The Senator from California made much ado about the December 23 statement issued by the Department of State. He wants to know who were the men who wrote it. Who is the man who, with pencil in hand, wrote some of this statement? Yes; who did? The State Department took responsibility for it. That means the Secretary of State vouches for it. It does not mean that he wrote it with his own hand, but it means that he sponsored it, that he stood for it. I think it is ridiculous to call upon any department to do down the line, and keep on going until they find out the person who actually wrote it on a typewriter. Who did it? Then they will want to know what kind of typewriter it was written on—what the number of the typewriter was, as in the trial of Mr. Hiss in New York. Yes; we want to know the clerk's name, the name of the stenographer, and the name of the man who dictated it, probably. Is that something the Senate of the United States should be bothering about? The statement is sponsored by the Secretary of State, and when the Secretary issued it, it became his statement, not that of the clerk, not that of the typist. A typist cannot be punished for what the Secretary of State did.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Does the Senator agree with me that it is rather a strange coincidence that distinguished Senators are so vigorously intent upon finding out who wrote this message to the diplomats in the eastern section of the world, yet they do not say one word about the individual on MacArthur's staff who leaked the information to the press?

Mr. CONNALLY. There is no condemnation here of General MacArthur that I have heard. It has been verified, as I understand, that the statement gained currency through someone on the staff of General MacArthur in Tokyo. Today's newspapers state the general has a large staff of military personnel, public-relations officers, and newspaper folk who are working in a military capacity, and the presumption is that some of them gave it to their favorite reporter.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Whether the statement is right or whether it is wrong, it is a statement coming from one who has the authority to issue the statement.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. The individual on MacArthur's staff who leaked it to the press did something that was certainly contrary to military orders. If the individual who was so anxious to leak this information to Senators, or to the press, wanted to do that, he should have taken off his military uniform and donned civilian clothes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I think General MacArthur, in the exercise of the authority which he possesses, ought to find out who the officer or who the man was who leaked the information. Here is a highly important State Department document. It was sent as a protection and as a guide to our foreign officers. It was sent to prepare them for any eventuality, yet we find it made public through a military man who gave it to the press of the entire world.

Mr. President, I now wish to advert to another subject. The Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] has used the expression "turning our backs on China," because we do not go into Formosa, because we do not go around to salute Chiang Kai-shek and to say, "We report for orders, Mr. Chiang Kai-shek," and because we do not take his side and supply him with an army and with the munitions and things of the kind. The Senator from California calls it turning our backs on a wartime ally. Mr. President, as allies in the war, who did the most? Did we do more for China or did she do more for us? We did all in the world we could for China. After the war she was assailed by the Communist Army. We did everything in the world we could do for China except to send an army. We gave her money, supplies, equipment, ECA aid, and all such benefits. What we did not do was to send an army from the United States to intervene in the war. Yet the Senator from California pours opprobrium on that program; he piles abuse on it and says we are turning our backs on a wartime ally. Ah, Mr. President, it is shameful to pervert the policy of this Government and its generosity toward China.

The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], whom I do not see on the floor at the moment, spent a large part of the afternoon instructing the rest of us by questions to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. But he has left the floor. I wanted to interrogate him as to whether he favors sending an army to Formosa, or whether he favors sending the Navy to Formosa. He stated that we have no policy as to China, and he attacked our lack of policy.

Mr. President, those charges are baseless, they are unsubstantiated, and they are unworthy of being made by a Senator of the United States.

I shall not take up more of the time of the Senate except to say that I want to know who the Senators are, and I shall revive the question from time to time, who want to plunge this country, not directly, but possibly, into world war III, in the name of Formosa, but principally in the name of a bitter attack upon the President of the United States and upon the Department of State. Assaults have been made on the President of the United States and the Secretary of State.

Mr. President, communism is something which is distasteful to us, but that does not mean that we are obligated to send an army to fight Communists wherever we find them. If that be the case, we should start in eastern Europe, in Bulgaria, Rumania, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and Yugoslavia, all of which are Communist countries. Is there any obligation on our part to send an army to subjugate them on the plea that we want to give liberty to the world? After we have liberated all the countries which I have named, then there is Russia. We must liberate Russia. She is a Communist nation, and we must liberate her people. We cannot stand for a Communist government anywhere in the world.

No, Mr. President, we are not obligated to do all these things for every country on earth. We have done a great deal for many of the countries of the world, and we should do much for them in the future. I hope we shall continue a liberal policy toward promoting free government and liberty and the use of economic systems which will benefit the great masses of the people, but I do not subscribe to the doctrine that there is any obligation on us to take a sword in our hand and, wherever we find a Communist government, undertake to subjugate it and liberate its people. We could not do it if we wanted to do it. That is not the function of the United States.

The Senator from New Jersey talked about Communists. He said that we must rout them out, hunt them down. Would he say to them, "Come out of your holes, you Communists"? It is like hunting a squirrel in a hollow log. "If there is a Communist element in your country, we are going to suppress you, liquidate you; we are going to destroy you."

No, Mr. President; we cannot do that.

What other country in the world has done as much for other nations as has the United States? What other country has given China as much as has the United States? The Senator from New Jersey—if I am in error, I should like him to correct me—spoke about the abandonment of China, I believe. It may have been the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND]. He uses that kind of term.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I think I was guilty.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator. If that is the only guilt that attaches to him, he is a very fortunate man. How did we abandon China? Did we have a treaty with China providing that we would protect her regardless of who attacked her? Did we send her a note saying, "Go to it. We will stand by you regardless of who attacks you"?

I will tell the Senate who abandoned China. Chiang Kai-shek abandoned her when he failed to give the Chinese people the reforms which they desired. The testimony of every witness whom I have heard discuss the subject has been that Chiang Kai-shek's government did not give to the Chinese people, the masses of the people, the reforms which they expected and desired. The testimony further is that he was surrounded by groups of corrupt officials from whom the people were unable to realize their ambitions and hopes. If anyone abandoned China it was Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek. When we went to his aid he was in control of all China except a few small territories in the extreme north. He was in possession of a great, rich, powerful nation, with large armies, several millions of men, armed with our guns, supplies, and equipment. Yet he could not maintain his position. He could not successfully resist the army which was recruited against him. From the pictures of them which I have seen, most of them were boys. Yet Chiang Kai-Shek could not maintain his position.

The Senator from New Jersey was asked whether he admitted that armed aid might provoke war——

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I admitted that if we gave armed aid there was danger of war occurring, but I was not advocating armed aid. I would support the thesis of the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] by doing what we did for the Greeks and Turks. That was turned down by the President, and that is the reason why I took this other approach.

Mr. CONNALLY. The sending of armed aid might provoke war. Did not the Senator advocate sending the Navy?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I did not advocate sending the Navy. I said the thesis I was presenting, in which I felt we might be called upon to defend those people in case the Communists did make an attack, was in line with what President Hoover had said with regard to the Navy and that which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] had said. It was a defense against attack, but not in the sense of carrying on an aggressive war.

Mr. CONNALLY. There is not much difference between a navy and an army. Either one can kill. If we are killed by either one, it does not make much difference which one does it.

Do I misunderstand the Senator? Does he now say he did not favor joining the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] and ex-President Hoover, both of whom advocated the sending of a navy there? Does the Senator repudiate that statement?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. In case of an attack by the Communist government I would favor protecting Formosa, if our plan was adopted of trying to make an independent Chinese province there, as I have advocated. Certainly I would want to protect it from being destroyed. Just as we would use the Navy to protect Korea if it were attacked, or would protect any of the islands of Japan.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from New Jersey did not say a word about defending Korea in his statement in the press. He sided with the Senator from Ohio and former President Mr. Hoover, in wanting to send the Navy. For what purpose? Our Navy has guns, it has airplanes, it has all the armament that goes to make up a great battle machine. Why does the Senator want to send it over there? Is it to play ping-pong? No; he wants to send it over there to fight somebody, he wants to send it over there to kill somebody, he wants to send the Navy over there to fight Communists, and thereby run the risk of plunging this Nation into world war III—world war III, with all its horrors, with all its misery, and all the wreck and ruin which would come to our people if they were provoked in any way to plunge the United States again into a world war.

No, Mr. President, I shall not favor sending a single American boy with a gun in his hand to Formosa to settle a civil war six or seven thousand miles away from his home, in order to appease the political ambitions and the oratorical frothings of Senators in the United States Senate. I am not going to favor that, and I know the American people do not want us to do it.

Mr. President, it is my belief that if we did what certain Senators propose, if we should go into Formosa and occupy it, we would have a liability on our hands instead of an asset. The Chiefs of Staff have found that Formosa would be of no strategic value to us. We have Japan at the north, then Okinawa, then the Philippines. That is our line of defense to the east of Formosa, and none of those places involve the question of Communist government or Communist attack. Formosa would be a liability and not an asset.

Mr. President, I want the Senators who are so violent in their views, who are so prolific in their statements, who are so verbose in their oratory about Formosa, to tell us what they would do, what they ask the United States Government to do, what they ask the people to do. I want them to tell us what American boys they want to send to Formosa. I want them to tell the parents of those boys how many American boys they would send to Formosa to bleed and to die and to be buried in the jungle soil 7,000 miles away.

Mr. President, I am not for sending them. I shall fight such a proposal, and I know that the American people will fight it. Therefore I shall propound to every Senator who speaks on this question hereafter the question whether he favors that sort of a policy or whether he does not.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the body of the RECORD at this point, following the remarks by the Senator from Texas, from the statement issued by President Truman on United States relations with China, under date of December 18, 1946, the two paragraphs I have marked, in which it is clearly pointed out that the so-called surplus equipment which constitutes a great part of the amount mentioned by the Senator from Texas is, under the words of the President of the United States himself, "Aircraft, all nondemilitarized combat material, and fixed installations outside of China were excluded. Thus, no weapons which could be used in fighting a civil war were made available through this agreement." That referred to the surplus sales agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Assistance took the form of goods and equipment and of services, such as those involved in air and water transportation of troops. According to the latest figures reported, lend-lease assistance to China up to VJ-day totaled approximately $870,000,000. From VJ-day to the end of February, shortly after General Marshall's arrival, the total was approximately $600,000,000—mostly in transportation costs. Thereafter, the program was reduced to the fulfillment of outstanding commitments, much of which was later suspended.

* * * * *

China agreed to buy all surplus property owned by the United States in China and on 17 Pacific islands and bases with certain exceptions. Six months of negotiations preceded the agreement finally signed in August. It was imperative that this matter be concluded in the Pacific as had already been done in Europe, especially in view of the rapid deterioration of the material in open storage under tropical conditions and the urgent need for the partial alleviation of the acute economic distress of the Chinese people which it was hoped this transaction would permit. Aircraft, all nondemilitarized combat material, and fixed installations outside of China were excluded. Thus no weapons which could be used in fighting a civil war were made available through this agreement.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, it seems to me that the statement made by the Senator from Texas is one which Mr. Chamberlain might have made to the British Parliament in the time of Munich, that the distant country of Czechoslovakia was of no concern to the people of Britain, and though their liberty and their freedom were sold down the river to Nazi Germany, it was of no concern to the people of the British Empire. Of course, we know that was not true, that he made almost inevitable World War II, and I think that those of us who sincerely believe that the question of the Communist menace in China is a vital problem, feel that we are trying to prevent that type of appeasement which would inevitably lead to war.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, perhaps there is no more appropriate time than now to ask to have printed in the RECORD the text of Madame Chiang Kai-shek's farewell address to the American people. Some of us who were privileged to hear that little bit of humanity as she stood on the rostrum in the Senate a few years ago and delivered an extemporaneous address, appreciated her voice and her spirit as she addressed the American people over the radio yesterday. No matter how we feel about the Nationalists or the Communists in China, we can recognize a great character, a great soul, and a great patriot.

Tomorrow, Mr. President, I shall attend the meeting of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and after that I shall also have something to say in relation to what I think should be our foreign policy. I shall do it, not with the idea of seeking to instruct, because after all the Constitution recognizes the President as the spearhead in foreign relations, but I do think that the Senate and each individual Senator is under an obligation, especially in this stage of the world's history, when there is a conflict between two great ideologies, communism and what I call the American way of life.

At this time I ask that the farewell address to America by Madame Chiang Kai-shek be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Friends, I speak to you today to say good-by, to thank you for your kind hospitality, and to hope that perhaps my next visit to the United States will be in a happier atmosphere when my country will again be free from the ponderous hooves of an alien invader.

Naturally it is always sad for me to leave this country to which I come not only as a visitor but also as one who here spent many years of my girlhood, where I received all of my schooling and much of the inspiration for whatever I have been able to do for my people.

In a few days I shall be returning to China. Not to Nanking, Chungking, Shanghai, or Canton. Not to the soil of our mainland. I shall return to my people on the island of Formosa, the fortfess of our hopes, the citadel of our battle against an alien power which is ravaging our country.

With or without help we shall fight. We are not defeated. Millions of my countrymen are yet dedicated to the long fight. As long as a breath remains in us, and with faith in the Almighty, we shall continue the struggle. Not a day, not an hour, will pass which will not be devoted to our struggle for freedom.

PLEDGES UNREMITTING FIGHT

We shall fight fire with fire. Unremittingly and with the tenacity of life, we shall fight and bleed the enemy. Everywhere in China's mainland our guerrillas will keep kindled the torch of liberty. The enemy's lies and deceit, their treachery and propaganda will be defeated not only with bullets but also with truth.

The oppressed people on the mainland will be prepared so that at a given signal they will rise up simultaneously and overthrow the yoke of Communist domination with our returning armies.

To this we are dedicated with our lives.

It is possible that we shall give every appearance of failure. It is possible that those who take a short view of life and no view at all of moral principles will write China off as a failure.

I hope that wherever my voice carries, to whatever free corner of the world, I can help awaken liberty-loving peoples to the realization that China, abandoned and alone, now shoulders the only rifle in the defense of liberty. The world is divided between liberty and communism. In a day not too far distant millions of others will have to make the choice between fighting for their liberty or surrendering to enslavement.

Let no one be deceived. Ours is the cause of freedom. It is not, and the world should know it is not, our struggle alone. China's struggle now is the initial phase of a gigantic conflict between good and evil, between liberty and communism.

For more than 20 years my husband has led his people in the fight against communism. He alone was responsible for China's break with the Communists in 1926 when he became convinced that Russia was laboring even then to steal our country. He saw that China was being made an experiment for all the wiles and tricks which Russia since has used against the world.

TIMES HAVE CHANGED

Chiang Kai-shek, of all the world's statesmen, was first to perceive the treachery of the Communists. He was the first to fight them. A few years ago he was exalted for the courage and tenacity of the fight he waged. Now he is pilloried. Times have changed, but the man has not changed. My husband remains resolute, to lead his people against the alien invaders and their alien ideas.

Our people will continue to fight for our country from some place, from such an island as Formosa, or from the fastness of some mountain, as long as we live, or as long as there is an alien enemy on China's soil. I say that to you not in the spirit of dramatic political assertion, but as a statement of fact.

Already the moral weaklings are forsaking us. It is with heavy heart that I note that a former ally, Britain, which sacrificed millions of lives on the altar of freedom, has now been taken by its leaders into the wilderness of political intrigue. Britain has bartered the soul of a nation for a few pieces of silver. I say "for shame" to Britain. One day these pieces of silver will bear interest in British blood, sweat, and tears on the battleground of freedom. For that which is morally wrong can never be politically right.

NEVER GIVE UP

Truth requires that each people live according to its own traditions in a climate of human liberty and dignity. That has been the soul of Chinese civilization. That my people will never give up—not in the face of alien power, not even if their bodies are enslaved to alien might, so long as their eyes behold the beacon of freedom from the Formosan bastion. Our souls, our hearts will be free, and we shall act accordingly as best we can.

Should it be that some of us are killed in this battle for freedom, others will rise to take our places. There will not be a day of peace for the invader. No great powers can arrange treaties, no statesmen can write contracts, that will stifle the Chinese yearning for liberty.

Mothers will sing of it in lullabies, fathers will speak of it at the table, young schoolboys will give each other secret signs of liberty, the farmer will suffer, but the earth will grow for the enemy, not grapes and figs, but thorns and thistles.

It was out of a mass movement to free China from an earlier alien conqueror that the great revolutionary movement of Dr. Sun Yat-sen developed—a movement which expelled those invaders and established a Chinese Republic.

CITES FRIENDSHIP WITH UNITED STATES

No force will prevail to alter that. We live not by the sword but by our principles of life. Others for the sake of expediency may desert them, but in time of adversity, when the hour is dark, we cling to our principles with even greater tenacity, and that, perhaps, accounts for our having the longest continuous history of any people on earth.

The United States and China have a long friendship, as long as the history of the American Republic. Many of your citizens have lived in our country. Your people have come to our aid and have given us comfort. Yours has been a contribution of affection. You have asked for no quid pro quo. Your name among us will always be cherished for its friendship and friendliness.

I can ask the American people for nothing more. During the many months that I have been in this country I have made no speeches, I have made no appeals. I did not enter into the competition for your aid, although my country sorely needs your aid.

I shall tell you why I have been so silent. When a nation, like a man, does an act of justice it must be of his conscience and not by request or demand. There are acts of mercy, acts of charity, acts of justice. And justice is right because it is right.

Perhaps you will think me proud. My friends, my country is humbled. Our Government is on an island in the ocean. Bruce of Scotland remained with his people from a cave. We remain with our people from an island.

A MATTER OF THE HEART

At such a time no pleading can be with dignity. It is either in your hearts to love us, or your hearts have turned from us. It is either in your mind and your will to aid China in her struggle for liberty, or you have abandoned liberty.

What promise can we make to you? What guaranties can we give you? Shall we compete with those who promise more than they can ever deliver?

We stand with empty but willing hands. We stand humble, tired, crying for peace and rest, even more than for rice and bread—but we cannot give up the fight for liberty. We shall not give up the fight for liberty. With or without help, China shall fight for liberty. Alone it will take longer and cost more lives. With help our gains will be swifter. But free we shall be.

Resolute in spirit and confidence that man's inherent love of freedom and justice will emerge victorious our forces will fight on. History records with devastating truth that right will prevail.

Russia will never know one day of peace in China. Russia will never own China. China will remain free.

Good-by, my friends. I thank you.

INFORMATION AS TO BIDS ON DEFENSE DEPARTMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, I should like to take this opportunity to advise the Senators of a new policy which has just been announced by the Secretary of Defense. This policy relates to a plan designed to give distribution to bid information which will particularly and materially aid small businesses. This policy was formulated for the Secretary and the Munitions Board by the Small Business Subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the statement I have prepared be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCFARLAND in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the remainder of Mr. FREAR's statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In a recent release, Trilane Associates, an organization devoted to accurate, factual reporting of Government procurement, it was stated therein, in part, as follows:

"Designed to give all business a better chance 'to window shop' for a larger share of Army, Navy, and Air Force defense contracts, a new policy resolution was approved by the Secretary of Defense Johnson and the Munitions Board in Washington today (January 6, 1950), it was revealed today in an inside story by Henry Scharf, publisher of the Government Procurement Daily Bulletin.

"In a bylined story mailed to subscribers of his publication this evening (January 6, 1950) Mr. Scharf declares that the action by the Munitions Board 'delivers a final blow to 5-percenters and offers a strong helping hand to all business—especially small business.'

"The publisher points out that the new policy resolution is 'the direct result of a 7 months' fight' initiated by his staff and carried to its final conclusion by Senator BURNET R. MAYBANK's Small Business Subcommittee of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee.

"The new resolution makes possible for the first time, says Mr. Scharf, the accurate, timely, and complete dissemination of news concerning available invitations to bid on unclassified military procurement. The Board's action, he adds, is completely in the public interest and 'restores the intent of Public Law 413, passed by the Eightieth Congress, to permit American businessmen, large and small, to openly and publicly compete for contracts estimated at close to $20,000,000,000 for 1950.'

"With further reference to the part played by his staff in helping to shape the resolution, Mr. Scharf reveals that his publication furnished 'documented evidence' on June 17, 1949, to the Senate Small Business Subcommittee. 'This evidence,' he adds, 'brought to a head the elimination of restrictive conditions prevalent heretofore.'

" 'The effect of the resolution,' concludes Mr. Scharf, 'is to lift the clouds of secrecy from public information, and to pull the foundations from under 5 percenters'."

In another statement the publisher of the above daily bulletin released the following, in part, as follows:

"As we go to press we learn from authoritative sources that the 'open door' policy is in the form of a resolution approved by the Munitions Board in Washington yesterday and signed this morning by the Secretary of Defense. The resolution, anticipated to become effective February 1, is the direct result of a 7-month's-old fight initiated by this staff and carried to its final conclusion by Senator MAYBANK's Small Business Subcommittee of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. It offers a strong helping hand to all business—especially small business—while it delivers the final blow to the '5 percenters.'

"For the first time, since record-breaking procurement budgets have harassed small-business men with the urge to participate in this gigantic spending, the resolution now makes possible the accurate, thorough, timely, and complete dissemination of news concerning available invitations for bid. Of necessity this applies only to unclassified military procurement.

"All procurement defined by this resolution offers small business—manufacturers, dealers, and distributors alike—a chance to window-shop for a larger share of Army, Navy, and Air Force business.

"We learn that the Munitions Board order, which is to be implemented by a directive on or about February 1, will make it mandatory upon the major military procurement agencies to open their doors to 'competitive bidding.'

"The Board's order successfully consummates 7 months of hard work by this staff and other members of the Trade Press working with the Small Business Subcommittee of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee.

"Trilane started the ball rolling—the writer can now reveal that this publication played an important part in protecting the rights of both the small-business man and the trade press. In fact, it was this publication's documented evidence, furnished the Senate Small Business Subcommittee on June 17, 1949, that brought to a head the elimination of restrictive conditions that have prevailed heretofore.

"The Senate Committee invited the opinions of other publishers who soon joined in the battle.

"Prior to the passing of this resolution the House Select Committee on Small Business joined forces with the Senate Banking and Currency Committee's Small Business Subcommittee. Jointly with the counsel for the Munitions Board, counsel for the subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee and the Director for Military Supply for the Munitions Board, Rear Adm. M. L. Ring, they in conference agreed upon the terms of the resolution as it was passed today in its final form.

"The statements made to the Munitions Board by the congressional committee's chairman, lauded the achievements of these publications as follows: 'It is of the utmost importance to small business that procurement information be expanded instead of curtailed.' Pointing out the impossible task of smaller manufacturers and contractors to maintain staffs at procurement centers and the dependence of small business upon individual listing and publications of procurement information, the committees urged the Munitions Board to make 'available to small business institutions more information on prime and prospective subcontracts—to provide greater opportunity and freer competition, with resultant lower prices to the Federal Government.'

"The intent of the resolution is to lift the clouds of secrecy from public information; thus it virtually pulls from under the foundations on which '5 percenters' have thrived for so long.

"The resolution, when implemented, will bring at the year's start new opportunities to manufacturers, dealers, and distributors, large and small alike, wherever located, for each coming year."

THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET—STATEMENT BY SENATOR BYRD

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement I have prepared in relation to the President's budget.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The President's budget message just read to the Senate today is startling for it is the first time he has failed specifically at least to propose a balanced budget, and it is extremely dangerous because at a time of peace and highest prosperity the President apparently would embark this Nation on a policy of heavy deficit spending for an indefinite period.

Last year he proposed to offset an estimated $800,000,000 deficit with a recommendation for $4,000,000,000 in new taxes.

This year he estimates a $5,100,000,000 deficit but in carefully framed language there is no promise that new taxes he will propose would balance the 1951 budget even if the tax increases were adopted.

History will record that the President has proposed another indefensible failure to balance the Federal budget in another year of peace and greatest prosperity in history.

In fact, although giving lip service to a balanced budget at some future date, the 1951 budget message fails even in an estimate of when that might occur.

The President's message on the economic report Friday placed great emphasis on a crystal-ball prediction as to a great increase in national income 5 to 50 years from now, but in the budget message today the President turns this prospect away from the rosy aspect of individual prosperity to the anticipation that higher incomes will bring in more taxes.

His statement that, "as our economy grows, tax revenue will grow also," seems to be a prediction that as income increases it will be the signal for increased Government expenditures.

There seems to be no place in this budget or in the fiscal situation it anticipates for the old rule of balanced budgets, reduced debt, and reduction in taxes. This of course high lights the fallacy in the Friday economic report which challenged American taxpayers to engage in more capital investment.

The budget message just read to the Senate estimates 1951 expenditures will be approximately $42,500,000,000. But analysis of proposals reveals that they will be close to $43,000,000,000 unless postal rates are increased by $400,000,000.

The President estimates 1951 revenue will be less than $37,500,000,000 exclusive of later tax adjustment proposals increasing revenue. And it should be noted that any general revenue tax increases proposed in the later message will be in addition to $1,500,000,000 of new social-security and socialized-medicine pay-envelope deductions which are proposed in the message today.

The President estimated that the deficit in 1951 will be $5,100,000,000. This time last year he estimated that the deficit in the current year would be $800,000,000. He could be as wrong this year as he was last. The latest estimate on the current year deficit is $5,500,000,000—an error of nearly five billion in the original estimate. A slight recession in business of 10 percent immediately would be reflected in tax revenue which would decline nearly $5,000,000,000.

As to when we may expect a balanced budget he merely says, "In preparing this budget I have carefully evaluated the possible alternatives in the light of the realities of our present situation. The soundness of a fiscal program cannot be properly changed simply by the year to year change in the expected margin between receipts and expenditures. A prudent program must meet much broader tests if it is to serve the long-range needs of our people."

The President's refusal to retrench should be viewed in the light that the budget he proposes is $8,200,000,000 more than expenditures in fiscal year 1948 which ended only 18 months ago. He makes great capital of the fact that his expenditure proposals are $860,000,000 less than estimated expenditures in the current year (2 percent). But this dwindles to lower insignificance if Congress fails as it did this year to enact an increase in postage rates of nearly $500,000,000. And if this postal increase is not enacted the estimated deficit for 1951 automatically surpasses the estimate for the current year.

Under the President's proposals domestic-civilian expenditures (exclusive of veterans and interest) would total $12,250,000,000 as compared with $6,900,000,000 in 1948, and $11,400,000,000 estimated for the current year. This expenditure for non-war-connected purposes is far more than the total budget (including defense, foreign, veterans, and interest) in any peacetime year before World War II.

In this budget foreign expenditures are reduced by $1,300,000,000 and domestic expenditures are increase by nearly $1,000,000,000, indicating that as expenditures for foreign relief and recovery programs are decreased expenditures are to be increased for domestic boondoggling in such fields as housing, works, federalized education and socialized welfare, health, and security.

Under the glare of publicity to the steady and tremendous increase in these domestic-civilian items the President suggests that atomic-energy and merchant-marine costs might be considered in the defense category, but this would be in contradiction to the existing civilian policies which have been emphasized for these functions.

As it stands, the proposed program for the military in 1951 will cost more than any year since demobilization was completed in 1948. This is despite the fact that this will be the third year of unification. It will be despite Secretary Johnson's civilian employment reduction order. And it will be despite the improved budgetary procedures enacted for the Military Establishment last year. And it should be noted further that the 13½ billion dollar expenditure program for the Military Establishment in 1951 contemplates only a 48-group air force, which is less than Congress authorized last year.

The form of the budget has been modernized to conform with Hoover Commission recommendations, and it includes a supplement which the deficit-spending advocates will hail as a summary of capital investments, but its tendency toward socialistic programs and its deficit-spending recommendations are unchanged.

Close analysis of the budget will reveal a renewal of the advocacy of a trend toward the use of trust fund techniques to avoid budgetary revenue and expenditures. This will be found in the proposal to increase pay-envelope deductions for socialized medicine and expanded social security. If these proposals should be adopted the revenue from these taxes would not show in the budget totals and neither would the expenditures. But the assessments would be in the nature of taxes just the same and the payments would be in the nature of expenditures, although they would not affect the deficit or surplus.

Frankly, I am opposed to many of the policies and programs financed in this budget, but I know they cannot be withdrawn suddenly. However, in view of the imminent danger to our economic system inherent in the present fiscal situation—marked by constant deficits and the towering debt, which under 1951 budget proposals soon will approach the all-time war peak—something must be done now.

Therefore, we must resort to the alternative of seeking practicable retrenchment within the bounds of existing policies which at least would reverse the trend.

I have demonstrated by my own budget calculations that in this period of peace and highest prosperity failure to balance the budget is indefensible.

It is the responsibility of Congress alone to appropriate money for. Federal expenditures, and I trust that even without the support of the President, Congress will balance the budget by retrenchment and avoid the necessity for additional taxes. With the facilities of the new single appropriation bill I am confident this can be done without the impairment of any essential function.

To this end, I am submitting for the consideration of Congress an expenditure budget of $36,000,000,000, which I believe would turn the tide away from state socialism—the inevitable result of continued deficit spending—and put this Nation on a road to democratic progress unsurpassed in history.

It is apparent that under the President's recommendations the Federal Government would be headed toward an extended era of chronic deficit spending which might continue until the public debt crushes us into national insolvency.

We ended fiscal year 1949 last June 30 with a deficit of nearly $2,000,000,000. Next June 30 we shall end the current fiscal year with a deficit of from $5,000,000,000 to $8,000,000,000 (thus far this year, from July 1 through December 30, the cumulated deficit is $3,299,798,921).

In the 2-year period of peace and high income from July 1, 1948, to June 30, 1950, we shall have raised the public debt by at least $8,000,000,000, and it then will total more than $260,000,000,000.

At the present income level, with neither retrenchment nor increased taxes, the momentum of present Federal spending will pile up another deficit of more than $5,000,000,000 in the fiscal year beginning next July 1. Then the debt in peacetime would be close to its wartime peak.

THE YEAR OF CRISIS

Congress in its present session must make the vital decision of whether to:

1. Increase taxes by more than $5,000,000,000;

2. Retrench, and, as I shall show in this statement, this can be done within a balanced budget, without impairing either our security or any essential function; or

3. Authorize expenditures totaling more than $5,000,000,000 in excess of revenue and go gayly along the economic primrose path of indefinite deficit financing.

Deliberate adoption by Congress of the deficit spending course in an era of peace and highest prosperity will shatter public confidence in Federal securities at a time when the debt is more than a quarter of a trillion dollars.

The deliberate embracing of deficit financing in a period of near-peak national income is even more alarming in view of the Administration's apparent determination to urge upon Congress the adoption of still more new Federal spending ventures of huge and unpredictable cost.

NEW TAXES

New taxes were proposed by the President last year and a recession followed until the proposal was withdrawn.

We are now paying more than 5 times the total tax receipts collected in the year before the war. Although personal income from nearly full employment is close to its peak it is still less than two and a half times its total in the year before the war.

To impose new taxes on top of the existing burdensome and, in many instances, almost confiscatory taxation would put us in a position where any minor business decline could easily be accelerated into a major recession.

And to assume that revenue will remain at its present level under the existing tax structure would be to assume that the present high personal income would remain at the current level. If, in a period of recession, income should drop 10 percent below its present figure (it would still be greater than in 1948), the loss in Federal revenue would be $5,000,000,000.

To see the effect of new taxes on business it should be noted that the total Federal tax take from all corporate income is $12,000,000,000. If $5,000,000,000 additional taxes were levied on corporations it would be an increase of around 40 percent.

To see how new taxes would affect individuals it should be noted that the Federal Government takes $18,000,000,000 in taxes on individual income (exclusive of excise taxes paid by all who buy). To add $5,000,000,000 in new taxes to individual income assessments would increase them by nearly 30 percent.

To see how new taxes would affect the combined tax payments by individuals and corporations, $5,000,000,000 additional would be an average increase of more than 16 percent on the two.

The only remaining principal source of Federal revenue is excise taxes which are now costing us $7,000,000,000 to $8,000,000,000. Many of these excise taxes are still on a wartime basis and could not be increased.

It is easily possible and, in fact, probable that an effort to collect $7,000,000,000 additional taxes by increasing Federal rates actually would result in diminishing dollar returns.

In my considered judgment any substantial increase in taxation at this time would deal a savage blow to the private enterprise system and our continued prosperity.

HOW TO BALANCE THE NEW BUDGET

When the President, with the assistance of the Bureau of the Budget and the Treasury Department, was preparing the Federal budget for the fiscal year 1951, which begins July 1, and I respectfully submitted to the President, to the Congress, and to the country that—

1. If he, with the full influence of his office and his personal support, would submit an expenditure budget not in excess of $36,000,000,000 (which would be nearly $2,000,000,000 more than expenditures in fiscal year 1948).

2. If the public would give it sympathetic approval.

3. If Congress would not enact a budget in excess of that maximum.

4. Revenue would cover expenditures; no essential function of the Government need be impaired; and there would be no need for recommendation by the President, enactment by Congress, or payment by the public, of new taxes.

SOUND GOVERNMENT AND SUSTAINED PROSPERITY

On the basis of more than 16 years spent in closely analyzing and studying Federal fiscal policies and the Nation's economy, I am unable to escape the conclusion that a balanced budget within the ability of the people to pay is an absolute requirement for the preservation of the Government's solvency and the stability of our economy. Without solvency and stability, our form of government cannot survive.

At the same time I am confident that achievement of a sound balanced budget would reaffirm the confidence of the public in prospects for our continued solvency and strengthen the private enterprise system which is basic to our form of government.

This confidence is based upon the conviction that a sound and reasonable budget would—

1. Balance with a surplus sufficient to justify correction of tax inequalities and injustices which admittedly exist, and this might provide a business stimulus to pave the way for further tax reduction in response to the growing demand.

2. Break the momentum of deficit financing policies.

3. Dispell the fear of private enterprise inherent in Government encroachment through public debt and by Federal controls which lead to socialism.

4. Stimulate constructive investment, development, and expansion in industry and agriculture for the production of more of the still tremendous backlog of things people everywhere need and desire at prices they can pay.

5. Put savings to work through private enterprise creating the wealth which is required to lift the great millstone of debt from our backs and leave us erect with the dignity of a sufficient and creative people, free and unregimented in the pursuit of happiness.

THIRTY-SIX BILLION DOLLARS WOULD BE A BUDGET OF PROGRESS

A $36,000,000,000 expenditure budget would be four times the maximum expenditures in the highest prewar budget, and it need not represent a single element of reaction.

Personally I believe it could be less, but a $36,000,000,000 budget would be nearly $2,000,000,000 more than all Federal expenditures in fiscal year 1948, which ended only 18 months ago, and it should be sufficient to cover the demands of all reasonable people.

It can be achieved without superhuman effort. It can be reached principally by foregoing nonessential increases and elimination of administrative inefficiency, extravagance, and waste.

I repeat for emphasis that a $36,000,000,000 budget would be $2,000,000,000 greater than the Federal expenditure budget in fiscal year 1948, which ended only 18 months ago, when farm and industrial production was at or near its peak, when agricultural, business, and personal income, in general, were at or near their peak, when the cold war was neither colder nor hotter than it is now, when the budget was balanced, and when a rare reduction in the Federal debt was accomplished.

CHAPTERS AND VERSES OF A $36,000,000,000 BUDGET FOR PROGRESS

In general

The greatest increases in Federal expenditures since 1949 have occurred in domestic-civilian items. There have been others, of course, in veterans, foreign, defense, and interest categories.

By the standards of the 1948 budget, which no one could regard as niggardly, no over-all reduction would be necessary to achieve a $36,000,000,0000 budget of progress. In fact there would be an increase of $2,000,000,000.

But if the Budget Bureau's latest estimate of the current 1950 rate of spending is to be used as a standard, reductions of $5,500,000,000 would be required.

For those to whom places to retrench in the 1950 budget are not obvious I would suggest the place to start would be the submission to Congress, and its enactment, of all the Hoover Commission Report recommendations looking toward economy and efficiency which Mr. Hoover estimated would save $3,000,000,000.

On the basis of the President's 1950 budget recommendations, there were 300 run-of-the-mill items, exclusive of veterans, foreign, defense, interest, claims, judgments, and all other nondeferrable commitments, imperative obligations and fixed charges, in which increases over 1949 expenditures were requested.

Civilian employment in the executive branch is still more than double the prewar emergency peak, and civilian payroll and administrative costs are running to approximately $7,500,000,000.

There are still 60 principal departments and agencies in the Government with more than a thousand component units, many of which are engaged in duplicated and overlapping activities.

There is a growing and costly tendency among all concerned with Federal spending programs toward the practice of authorizing program expenditures without annual limitation, over which there can be little or no control.

All of these are areas where general retrenchment should be required.

Specifically

In order that there may be no question about the suggestions in my proposed $36,000,000,000 budget of progress for fiscal year 1951, beginning next July 1 (previously set forth in tabular form), it is analyzed item by item, first by comparison with expenditures in fiscal year 1948, which ended June 30, 1948, and then by comparison with the estimated current rate of expenditure in the present fiscal year 1950, which ends next June 30.

Domestic-Civilian

Compared with 1948

In 1948 expenditures for domestic-civilian items (exclusive of veterans and interest) totaled $6,900,000,000.

A $36,000,000,000 budget for progress for fiscal year 1951 would allow a $2,000,000,000 increase in these items, or more than 25 percent, over the 1948 total for sound advancement in social welfare, health and security, housing and community facilities, education and general research, agriculture and agricultural resources, natural resources, transportation and communication, finance, commerce and industry, labor, and general government.

On the basis of 1948 expenditures substantial increases would be allowed for housing, agriculture and public works. Decreases would occur primarily in the postal deficit and the so-called general government item.

Compared with 1950

In the current fiscal year 1950 domestic-civilian expenditure items (exclusive of veterans and interest) are estimated to total $11,900,000,000.

For those who wish to consider the $36,000,000,000 budget of progress proposal as a reduction from 1950 instead of an increase over 1948, it is pointed out that there are more than 50 principal departments and agencies with hundreds of component units—all with pay rolls and administrative expenses—in the domestic-civilian category.

With this background in view the following suggestions can be justified:

The pay roll and administrative costs in these agencies are now running at nearly $4,000,000,000 a year. Their employment is approximately 1,000,000. Spread over 50 principal agencies and their hundreds of component units, with advantage taken of seasonal adjustments, this employment could be reduced by 250,000. This would still leave their employment total at 750,000, which would be approximately 15 percent more than the aggregate employment in this category at the prewar-emergency peak in 1939. The savings, including those in administrative costs which necessarily would come down, would be approximately $900,000,000. This would be spread over the agencies in the nine functional groups comprising the domestic-civilian category.

In addition to pay roll and administrative reductions, at least $400,000,000 should be saved by tightening up the open-end mortgage purchase program of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. This would require new legislation, but it would still leave more than the amount originally recommended by the President for the current year, which he revised upward by $1,100,000,000 in November.

In addition to pay roll and administrative reductions in the Department of Agriculture, at least $200,000,000 could be saved by new legislation based on a reexamination of the open-end Commodity Credit Corporation authorization and this would still leave more than the amount originally recommended by the President for this program for the current year, which he revised upward by $800,000,000 in November.

In addition to pay roll and administrative reductions, the $500,000,000 postal deficit should be at least partially saved by new legislation which would compensate for the loss in those classes of mail which are now being handled on a deficit basis, but elimination of glaring inefficiency in the Post Office Department, criticized sharply in the Hoover Commission Report, should largely offset increases in rates which could not be absorbed by users.

After reductions in pay roll and administrative costs in the natural resources group, there would be a considerable reduction to be absorbed primarily by nonessential public-works projects which could be postponed or slowed down, but there still would be as much remaining to be spent on public works as there was in 1948.

These reductions would total $3,000,000,000 in comparison with November estimates of expenditures in the current fiscal year 1950, ending next June 30, and they would leave $8,900,000,000 to be spent on domestic-civilian functions in fiscal year 1951, beginning next July 1. This would be $2,000,000,000 more than was spent in fiscal year 1948.

Veterans

Compared with 1948

In 1948 expenditures for veterans totaled $6,600,000,000.

A $36,000,000,000 budget of progress for fiscal year 1951 would allow $5,300,000,000 for all activities of the Veterans' Administration which, although slightly less than the amount available in 1948, would be accounted for entirely by reduction in excessive payroll and administrative costs and the normal tapering off of the GI benefit programs as contemplated, and it still would be within 4 percent of the amount originally recommended by the President for the current 1950 fiscal year.

For those who wish to consider this proposal as a reduction from 1950 instead of comparing it with 1948, the following suggestions can be justified:

The pay-roll and administrative costs of the Veterans' Administration are now running to approximately three-quarters of a billion dollars a year. This could be reduced by $175,000,000 and still leave employment by the Administration at 150,000. This would be five times greater than its 1939 employment. The veterans' population of the United States (including many who are receiving no service from the Administration) is 19,000,000. This is far less than five times the 4,300,000 veterans' population of 1939.

If the readjustment-benefits program expenditures were reduced by $1,300,000,000 there would still remain $1,750,000,000 for this program. This would be a reduction of $500,000,000 under the President's original estimate for these programs for 1950. In fiscal year 1951 the war will have been over more than 5 years, and most veterans will have been out of the service approximately 4 years. This reduction would not apply to pensions, hospitalization, etc., but the time has come for the majority of those still receiving "readjustment" benefits to regard that part of their country's debt to them as paid. And this applies also to business and educational institutions which have been profiting by the program as well. It does not seem unreasonable to start tapering this program down sharply.

Compared with 1950

These reductions would total approximately $1,500,000,000 in comparison with estimated 1950 expenditures, most of which would be absorbed in programs which normally might be expected to be reaching the end of their intended usefulness.

Foreign

Compared with 1948

In 1948 expenditures in all international affairs and foreign-assistance programs totaled $4,800,000,000.

Under a $36,000,000,000 budget for progress for fiscal year 1951 $4,800,000,000 would still be available for all international affairs and foreign assistance programs and no reduction under 1948 would be necessary despite the fact that the war will have been over 5 years and we shall have spent nearly $35,000,000,000 for this purpose. It is generally conceded that reduction in some of the programs is due and justified, and any reductions indicated could be absorbed in these programs.

Compared with 1950

For the benefit of those who wish to consider this proposal as a reduction from the $6,300,000,000 1950 expenditures instead of an amount equal to expenditures in 1948, the $1,500,000,000 reduction could be absorbed in programs which are nearing the expiration of their usefulness.

National Defense

Compared with 1948

In 1948 expenditures for national defense and supporting activities (including stock piling) totaled $11,000,000,000.

A $36,000,000,000 budget of progress for fiscal year 1951 would allow $11,300,000,000 despite the fact that our troops have been evacuated from many foreign lands, our military government activities have been substantially reduced, the draft and UMT have been suspended, and we will have had nearly 3 years of unification in which economy was supposed to have been a prime objective.

Compared with 1950

For the benefit of those who wish to consider this as a reduction from 1950 instead of an increase over 1948, it is pointed out that the Hoover Commission estimated that at least a billion dollars could be saved under unification of the armed services, and former Secretary of the Army Royall and Secretary of the Air Force Symington agreed.

Secretary of Defense Johnson recently said he was preparing a "scientific defense budget" and added that, "We are not only trying to get along on less; we will get along on a whole lot less." All of his recent statements have indicated that substantial reductions can be made in the military expenditures without impairing the national defense.

He has already sharply reduced civilian employment in the National Military Establishment despite the fact that funds appropriated for 1950 were based on original personal service appropriation requests providing for 865,000 civilian employees.

With this background in view the following suggestions can be justified:

The civilian pay roll and administrative costs of the National Military Establishment are running at approximately $3,500,000,000. The defense budget item for civilian personnel in fiscal year 1950 was based on employment requests for 865,000. The Secretary of Defense has already found that he can reduce the civilian employment by more than 125,000. If the civilian employment were reduced by 200,000 there would still remain about 1 civilian employee for each 2½ men in uniform. This would be approximately the same ratio which prevailed in fiscal year 1939 when the preparedness effort began to get underway. The saving in pay roll and administrative costs would be $1,000,000,000.

Another billion dollars should be saved in other aspects of military requirements, in view of the postwar evacuation of troops from many foreign areas, the substantial reduction in military government activities, the suspension of the draft and UMT, and nearly 3 years of unification in which economy was supposed to have been a primary objective.

These reductions would total $2,000,000,000 in comparison with 1950 expenditure estimates and still would leave an increase of $300,000,000 over 1948 expenditures for inauguration of the European Military Arms program.

Compared with current 1950 fiscal year estimates the grand total of reductions in a $36,000,000,000 budget for progress in 1951 would be $7,500,000,000, and the grand total of increases in comparison with actual expenditures in 1948 would be nearly $2,000,000,000.

SUMMARY

Under such a program, there would be no reduction in interest on the debt as compared with either 1950 or 1948. Actually there would be an increase over both years.

There would be no reduction in the essentials of the uniformed military forces or contractual obligations of the National Military Establishment as compared with either 1950 or 1948. There would be an increase for the European military arms program.

There would be no reduction in the veterans' programs for hospitals, pensions, etc. There would be no reduction in essential public works.

The reductions would occur principally in the "open-end" programs of the Commodity Credit Corporation, Reconstruction Finance Corporation, veterans' (readjustment), and in the postal deficit which appear to be subject to abuse and lax administration. And, in addition, a start would be made in eliminating waste, extravagance, and inefficiency in administration and excesses in employment of manpower which would be more useful elsewhere.

I submit such a budget would be one of progress which would return the Federal Government to its traditional role of fostering and stimulating our system of free enterprise—the secret to our standard of living, our productive genius, and the fulfillment of our responsibilities in world leadership.

I submit that adoption of a policy of indefinite deficit financing, and the debt which it will incur, in times of peace and high income will irrevocably commit this Nation to ultimate socialism, and together these would be instruments for the destruction of our form of government.

THE GOVERNMENT BUDGET

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to take just a few minutes to discuss certain aspects of the budget problem which confronts the United States as I see the problem. Today we listened to a very interesting budget message from the President of the United States. In respect to a great many of the recommendations in the message I find myself in complete agreement. In respect to the over-all objectives of the President of the United States, insofar as his sincere desire to promote the general welfare of the American people, in seeking to raise their standard of living, and carry out one of the commandments, I think, of our form of government, namely, making possible an ever greater pursuit of happiness on the part of the American people, I also find myself in agreement.

I find myself in disagreement, Mr. President, in respect to some of the administration's mechanics, procedures, and proposals for accomplishing what I think can generally be agreed are desirable over-all social and economic objectives.

Hence in the closing minutes of this session today I wish to raise a few budget problems, particularly for the attention of my Republican colleagues of the Senate. In recent weeks I have heard a great deal of discussion among Republicans in and out of the Senate of the United States in regard to a restatement of already existing Republican principles or the formulation of new Republican policies.

I think in the main the principles enunciated in the 1948 platform of the Republican Party are as sound today as they were when they were adopted in Philadelphia. They happen to constitute the only official statement of Republican policy which can be enunciated by the Republican Party until our next national convention. As I understand the organization of my party, our policies are determined in conventions assembled by properly appointed or elected delegates of the party sent to such conventions.

I recommend to my party the putting into legislative form the recommendations of the 1948 Republican platform. The great principles laid down in the Republican platform of 1948, of which platform committee the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was chairman are sound political policy for the Republican Party. I think they should be adopted by the Republicans in Congress as outlining our legislative program.

I raise here, as I have elsewhere, the questions: What is wrong with those principles? Why do we not go about putting them into legislative practice?

Thus, in respect to the principle of that platform in regard to a sound fiscal policy for our Government I want to suggest to the Republican Party today that we have a great opportunity to put into legislative form in this session of Congress a sound economy program for our Government.

A sound fiscal program is a dry subject for many people, because economy and taxes seem to be something from which many people like to retreat or ignore. Yet the need for a sound fiscal program for our Federal Government is one issue on which there is almost uniformity of opinion on the part of the American people. The issue of developing a sound budget and a sound fiscal program for the Federal Government is uppermost in the political thinking of the American people today. On that issue I suggest to the Republican Party it should take clear issue with the administration, because irrespective of how desirable some of the budgetary and legislative objectives of the administration may be, as stated by the President in the State of the Union message and in his budget message today, I am satisfied that those objectives can never be accomplished by the present fiscal policy of the administration.

Thus, in conformity with the Republican platform of 1948, I make to my Republican colleagues in the Senate of the United States today some specific recommendations on the budget and on taxes. Not only Republican voters, but the great mass of independent voters of this country who would like to vote for the Republican Party if we would give them a reason for voting for the Republican Party, are crying aloud these days for a specific, constructive, affirmative plan which will give greater assurance to the American taxpayer of a stabilized economy and a sound dollar.

Mr. President, three times I have offered to the Senate of the United States the tax-reform program of the Committee for Economic Development. It is presently pending before the Senate in the form of Senate bill 2627.

I am perfectly aware of the fact, Mr. President, that revenue legislation should come from the House, but there is nothing that stops in advance of a tax bill coming from the House of Representatives some thinking—yes, Mr. President, even some committee consideration of the tax problem in the Senate of the United States. Therefore I again raise my voice in plea this afternoon to our Committee on Finance to proceed at the earliest possible date in giving careful consideration to the budget and tax recommendations of the Committee for Economic Development. These recommendations are not mine, because I am not a tax expert and do not claim to be one, but I do believe my job in the Senate is to try to be a student of government and not a politician. I do not believe that any student of government can take the budget and tax recommendations of the Committee for Economic Development and not reach the conclusion that they constitute a sounder program than any program that has come from the House of Representatives or the Senate of the United States in either the Seventy-ninth, the Eightieth—yes, or the Eighty-first Congresses.

Just recently, Mr. President, the Committee for Economic Development has brought forth its latest report, a report which reached our hands over the week end, entitled "Tax and Expenditure Policy for 1950." Because I wish to address some of my remarks to this report, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the report printed as a part of my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCFARLAND in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAX AND EXPENDITURE POLICY FOR 1950

1. There will almost certainly be a large deficit—probably around $5,000,000,000—in the Federal budget [1] for the fiscal year 1949–50.[2] Even if high employment had been continuously maintained throughout 1949, there would be a deficit for 1949–50.

2. Because of its size—over $40,000,000,000—and its composition, the present Federal tax burden is a serious impediment to economic growth and a source of important inequities among individual taxpayers and among industries.

3. Federal outlays increased $10,000,000,000 from fiscal 1948 to fiscal 1950.[3] While particular items of expenditure will certainly decline in the next year, there are strong pressures for increases in many parts of the budget.

These facts form the background against which decisions about the Federal budget for 1950–51 will be made in the next few months. The budgetary problem is how to manage the budget so as to promote national security and general welfare most effectively. This is a problem involving both sides of the budget; both spending and taxing vitally affect our security and welfare. More specifically, the problem is how to do these three things:

(a) Provide the Government services and expenditures that are required by the world position of the United States and to meet the needs of the American people;

(b) Adjust the Federal tax system to make it fairer and less restrictive of efficiency and progress;

(c) Adhere to a sound budgetary policy that will contribute to continuing stability in the American economy.

This is the problem to which this policy statement is addressed.

There is no ideal solution to the budget problem. We cannot have, at the same time, all the expenditures that might be desirable, all the tax reforms and reductions that might be desirable and a sound budget policy. The possibilities of solving the budget problem are limited by the productivity of the American economy. As the productivity of the American economy grows, we shall be able to have both necessarily large expenditures and a lower tax burden without abandoning prudent budgetary principles. But today we must manage the budget within the limits set by today's productivity and we should seek to manage the budget in a way that will interfere least with the future growth of productivity.

Recognizing that there is no ideal solution to the budget problem of 1950, we believe that the best solution, the one most consistent with the demands upon the Federal budget, with the requirements of sound finance, and with the conditions of economic growth, would be:

(a) Provide for a moderate budget surplus to be realized under conditions that make a surplus possible and desirable, namely, conditions of high employment.

(b) Reduce or postpone expenditures that are not immediately essential to the national security or general welfare, and operate all programs more economically and efficiently.

(c) Revise the tax system in ways that will yield the most benefit to the whole economy from the small net revenue reduction that seems possible with the achievable expenditure reductions.

This is, in our opinion, a feasible program. Examination of the budget reveals large items that will automatically decline in the next year, other expenditures that have far outgrown the purposes for which they were intended, and numerous opportunities for greater economy. In section II of this statement we suggest specific ways in which expenditures may be reduced next year by from $6,600,000,000 to $6,800,000,000. If this were done, it would be possible to reduce taxes by about $2,225,000,000.[4] This is not a large amount in relation to the whole Federal tax burden—less than 5 percent. But it is large enough, if wisely used, to permit a significant improvement of the tax system.

We recommend that the following steps toward tax reform be taken in 1950:

1. Require payment of Federal income tax on interest income from future State and local security issues.

2. Permit businesses to deduct the losses of one year from the profits of the five following years in computing taxable net income (extending the carry-forward from 2 to 5 years).

(3) Revise Federal excise taxes, reducing their net yield in the order of $1 billion.

(4) Reduce the discriminatory taxation of dividend income.

(5) Correct the present provisions of the law under which corporate profits from $25,000 to $50,000 are taxed at a much higher rate than profits above or below that bracket.

[1] We refer here, and throughout this statement, to the cash-consolidated budget. This concept is explained on page 11 and in appendix B.

[2] Each fiscal year runs from July 1 through June 30 of the following year, and is labeled by its termination year. Fiscal 1950, therefore, is July 1, 1949, through June 30, 1950.

[3] See appendix A.

[4] Footnote by Beardsley Ruml: It would be possible to reduce taxes in the order of $3 billion if the purchase of FHA and Veterans' Administration guaranteed mortgages by the Federal National Mortgage Association (FNMA) were not considered an expenditure for budget purposes. A $3,000,000,000 reduction in taxes is significantly larger than the $2,225,000,000 suggested by the committee when applied to tax reform.

(6) Revise the present procedures under the legal provisions (sec. 102 of the Internal Revenue Code) relating to accumulation of corporate surplus, in order to reduce taxpayers' uncertainty.

(7) Improve the administration of present policy with respect to charging-off capital assets for tax purposes, to make its application more reasonable and clear.

These recommendations, and the reasons for them, are explained in subsequent sections of this report.

I. THE NEED FOR TAX REFORM AND THE NEED FOR TAXES

The need for tax reform

Our Federal tax system needs revision. A few simple illustrations will show what we mean.

Example 1: Suppose a group of men set up a corporation to manufacture a new product. They have design and production troubles at the start and lose $200,000 the first year. Next year they do a little better, losing only $150,000. In year three they finally break even. In the fourth year they make $50,000 and in each of the next three years they make $100,000. At the end of seven years their total profit has been zero; the losses of the first two years were just equal to the profits of the next five years. But at the end of these seven years the corporation will have paid $114,000 of Federal profits taxes on its zero profits.

This is unfair to the investors, obviously. But they don't have to go into this new business. If they think the risks are too great, that the taxes may eat up their capital before they start making money, they can stay out—and they probably will. Then who is the loser? Suppose the new product is a $15 device that can be attached to the side of the kitchen sink and left to wash the dishes. Millions of housewives lose. Suppose the new product is a machine that would enable the shoe worker to turn out more shoes and so to earn higher wages. Thousands of workers lose. The whole Nation loses because the tax system increases the risks of productive investment by narrowly limiting the period during which losses may be balanced against profits in computing taxable income.

Example 2: The Federal Government imposes a 3 percent excise tax on the transportation of freight. If a California fruit grower ships oranges to Chicago, the freight charge is raised 3 percent to cover this excise tax. This tax is paid either by the consumer in higher prices, or by the farmer in lower receipts or, most likely, shared by both. Thus we have in some combination a tax upon the consumption of food and a tax upon the production of food. Such taxes would be called an unfair burden upon persons least able to bear them, and so would the transportation tax, if it were seen to be what it is. Of course, the freight tax affects many commodities other than food, and with similar bad effects. In some cases the effect of the tax may be to raise prices to consumers by more than the amount of the tax, as the tax may be pyramided at numerous stages of fabrication and distribution.

Example 3: Interest on State and local government security issues is not subject to individual income tax. If a person receives $5,000 on interest on State bonds, he pays no tax on it, but if a person receives $5,000 income from salaries or dividends, he does pay a tax. This is unfair discrimination in favor of the holder of State and local securities. And this unfairness has a serious economic effect. For an individual with a taxable income of $200,000, a common stock paying dividends of 13 percent yields less net return after taxes than a municipal bond yielding 2½ percent. Our tax system creates a positive incentive for those individuals best able to bear the risks of investing in productive enterprise not to invest in productive enterprise.

These illustrations show only a few of the defects of our present Federal tax system. There are many others:

1. Insofar as the corporate income tax is not passed on in higher prices or lower wages, dividend income is taxed twice, once at the corporate level and once at the individual level. This is not only unfair to the stockholder. It is also an obstacle to equity investment.

2. Insofar as the corporate income tax is passed on in higher prices or lower wages, it is a haphazard and uneven turn-over tax or pay-roll tax.

3. High rates of excise taxation on particular commodities discriminate against producers and consumers of those commodities. In addition, they distort the pattern of production, reducing the output of things consumers want and would be willing to pay for—without the tax.

4. Corporations with incomes of $50,000 and over pay 38 percent tax on ever dollar of income. But a corporation with an income less than $50,000 pays 53 percent tax on ever dollar it earns between $25,000 and $50,000. This is an obstacle to the growth of small and medium-size businesses.

5. Present limitations on depreciation allowances may prevent the reduction in the value of capital assets from being fully charged off against taxable earnings, or from being charged off in a reasonable period. As a result, tax may be imposed when there are no net earnings. This is unfair, and a deterrent to investment.

6. Under present law an individual with a fluctuating income pays more tax than an individual with the same income spread evenly through time, since, with limited exceptions applying to certain professions, good years cannot be averaged with the bad. This is unfair and a penalty upon kinds of economic activity, like small business, that are likely to result in fluctuating incomes.

7. Present high rates of corporate profits tax and steep progression of individual income tax rates reduce particularly the supply of savings available for venturesome, productive investment. Especially when combined with other features of our tax system, these rates weaken the incentive to invest even when funds are available.

We have explained the economic effects of the Federal tax system more fully in an earlier policy statement.[5] All of the defects of the system cannot be corrected in 1950, but it is important to keep in mind the goal to be achieved as rapidly as possible.

The faults of the present tax system can be briefly summarized:

The Federal tax system contains many inequities.

The Federal tax system interferes with economic growth and efficiency.

Everyone stands to gain from more fairness, more efficiency, and more rapid economic growth. Whatever taxes he pays personally and directly, everyone stands to gain from tax reform.

Any taxes reduce the private incomes available for consumption and savings; high taxes do this more than low taxes. But this is not the point of our analysis of the Federal tax system. The points are these:

(a) Many of the inequities and adverse effects of the present tax system are not necessitated by revenue considerations. We could collect just as much money without many of these bad effects.

(b) The burden of a tax system yielding the present revenue is heavier than could be justified by any but the most urgent Federal expenditures. The Nation would be better off with lower Federal expenditures and lower taxes. This is a judgment involving not only the effects of taxes but also the effects of particular expenditures. In section II of this statement we examine the expenditure side of the budget and show that specific expenditures can be reduced without serious loss to the Nation—so that reduction of the expenditures and reduction of taxes would be a net benefit to the American people.

The need for taxes

We have emphasized the need for tax reform and tax reduction. We should also emphasize the need for adequate taxes. Taxes perform certain important functions in the economic system:

(a) Adequate taxes help prevent inflation and instability. If the Government makes expenditures and does not reduce, by taxation, the incomes available for individuals and businesses to spend, the competition of private and Government expenditures may cause inflation.

(b) Adequate taxes help to reduce the burden of the debt. In part, we pay taxes now to avoid the higher taxes that would be needed if we allowed the interest burden of the debt to rise.

(c) Adequate taxes help to promote economy in Government. The need for raising tax rates if expenditure programs are increased helps to bring the need for restraint into the forefront of budgetary decisions.

How high should taxes be to be adequate? In 1947 this committee recommended the following budgetary principle:

"Set tax rates to balance the budget and provide a surplus for debt retirement at an agreed high level of employment and national income."

This principle does not mean that the budget should or can be balanced in every year. Under this principle, when the national income is low there would be a deficit, because the tax rates high enough to yield a surplus at high employment will yield much less at low employment. Similarly, when the national income is above the agreed level, the surpus will be larger.

Tax rates set under this principle would serve the three functions of adequate taxation. To help prevent inflation, tax collections should be higher in boom conditions, when the danger of inflation is great, than in conditions of depression. To help reduce the burden of the debt, budget policy should provide for a surplus under conditions of reasonably high employment, when debt reduction is most in keeping with economic conditions. To promote economy, a close connection should be maintained between the decision to spend and the decision to tax. These three conditions are satisfied by the principle we have suggested.

Under this principle, we would look at the budget as it would be under conditions of high employment when we make decisions about the over-all levels of taxation and expenditure. Any planning for future budgets necessarily involves some assumption about future economic conditions. We do not believe this assumption can reliably be based on a forecast of what economic conditions will be. In suggesting the assumption of high employment, we are not forecasting that there will be high employment. Rather we suggest it because looking at the budget in this way permits us to answer the relevant question: Are tax rates high enough to yield a moderate surplus under conditions of high employment? The fact that tax rates are not high enough to prevent a deficit in a depression does not mean that tax rates are too low.

In order to make our recommendation more specific we have suggested that tax rates should be high enough to produce a three-billion-dollar surplus in the cash-consolidated budget at a level of national income consistent with employment of about 96 percent of the labor force. With the present population, when 96 percent of the labor force is employed, there would be about two and a half million unemployed.

[5] Taxes and the Budget, a statement on national policy by the Research and Policy Committee of the CED, November 1947.

Attention should be called to the fact that we recommend use of the cash-consolidated budget in making over-all budget policy. All budget figures presented in this statement are on the cash-consolidated basis. The cash-consolidated budget is a Federal financial statement which has come into increasing use in recent years as an improved picture of the economic effects of the budget. It differs from the administrative budget, which is used, and should be used, for administrative control purposes, chiefly in two respects:

(a) It includes the receipts and expenditures of the social security and other trust accounts.

(b) Certain expenditures included in the administrative budget when they accrue—such as interest on savings bonds—are included in the cash-consolidated budget only when cash payments are made.

A fuller description of the cash-consolidated budget is presented in appendix B.

The Budget Bureau issued a statement in November 1949 estimating that there would be a deficit of $5,500,000,000 in the administrative budget in the fiscal year 1949–50. Under the conditions of 1949–50 this would imply a deficit of $5,000,000,000 in the cash-consolidated budget. This $5,000,000,000 estimated deficit is not directly comparable with our target of a $3,000,000,000 surplus. The target is a target to be reached under conditions of high employment. The $5,000,000,000 estimated deficit, on the other hand, reflects the fact that during calendar 1949 unemployment has averaged about 1,000,000 above the 2,500,000 we have defined as consistent with high employment. We estimate that under conditions of high employment in 1949–50 present tax rates and expenditure programs would have resulted in a deficit of about $2,500,000,000.[6]

The goal is to get from a 1949–50 situation in which at high employment there would have been a deficit of $2,500,000,000 to a 1950–51 situation in which at high employment there would be a surplus of $3,000,000,000. This goal can be achieved by increasing taxes, by reducing expenditures, or by both. On the basis of our consideration of both sides of the budget, we believe that, barring unforeseen international developments, the only acceptable course is to reduce expenditures, and to reduce them enough to make some tax reduction possible. We believe that this result is achievable—if balanced, simultaneous consideration is given to both sides of the budget. The President, with the assistance of the Budget Bureau and the cooperation of the departments, has made important contributions to expenditure control, especially in the fields of national defense, public works, and foreign aid. The Budget Bureau has made notable steps in clarifying the budget presentation. Many Congressmen and Senators have shown great courage in their approach to the budget problem. But the task is a formidable one, involving not only control of existing programs but also restraint in dealing with dozens of proposals that would greatly increase Federal expenditure. Sound budget policy will be achieved only by vigorous effort on the part of the administration and the Congress and active support from the public. It is, after all, the security and welfare of the American people that are at stake.

The recommendations for 1950 presented in this policy statement fall far short of the whole tax-reform program that needs to be achieved. The preferred route to further tax reform is by further reduction of Federal expenditures. But if it should appear that further progress along this route after 1950 will be long delayed, either by the requirements of the international situation or by insistent public demands for Government services, we should not conclude that tax reform must be similarly delayed.

The prospect of Federal budgets persistently running in the neighborhood of 20 percent or more of the national income would create a situation new in American experience except during war. It would be necessary to consider how it might be possible to revise the principles of budgetary, debt, and tax policy appropriate to normal circumstances in order to minimize the impact of such large budgets upon the growth and strength of the economy. It is the intention of the committee to examine this and other basic questions growing out of our present budgetary outlook in a later policy statement. However, recognition that there are many unsettled questions should not deter us from making now the urgent tax reforms that will be possible with the practice of reasonable economy in the budget for fiscal 1951.

II. THE BUDGET FOR FISCAL 1951

It is the purpose of this section to indicate the amount of expenditure reduction that might be accomplished in the fiscal 1951 budget. We believe that the urgency of tax reform and tax reduction is so great that the budget for fiscal year 1951 should weight tax reduction and reform just as fully as socially desirable expenditures. In each case the social and economic gain from expenditures must be balanced against the social and economic loss resulting from the taxation required to finance it. If this is done, the postponement or abandonment of projects of marginal value will be required.

It is our belief that there could be made available for tax reform and reduction approximately $2,250,000,000 in the fiscal year 1951. This estimate suggests that with reasonable effort and resistance to pressure groups the possibility of tax reform is not so distant as generally believed. Further reforms are desirable and should be achieved within the near future but a start can and should be made at once.

The estimates and recommendations contained in this section are intended as suggestions for consideration by the public, the Congress and the administration. They indicate the areas to which we may most hopefully look for economies that will permit tax reduction in 1950. This committee does not have the complete information, and cannot make all the judgments, necessary to determine precisely how much must be spent for each government program. In some cases, further investigation may show that some of our suggestions cannot be fully carried out; in other cases, economies in excess of our estimates may prove to be possible. We believe that our suggestions show that determined effort can so adjust the budget as to make tax reduction feasible, despite the acknowledged existence of a hard core of irreducible expenditures.

The Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 established a procedure for making a congressional decision on the over-all size of expenditures and revenues at the same time. The failure of this procedure to work well so far is not, in our opinion, the result of inherent defects in the principle. It has resulted in part from lack of time, lack of staff and excesssive size of the budget committees. Also it reflects the great difficulty in recent years of reconciling our objectives with respect to expenditures taxation and the debt. We believe that the Legislative Budget procedure can and should be made to work. Congress, having before it the President's Budget and other information, should decide upon over-all expenditure and revenue figures for 1950–51 early in the session. The expenditure figure would serve as a guide to Congress in making appropriations. The revenue figure will indicate to Congress the limits within which it may operate in tax revision.

We should emphasize that the calculations presented in this section are designed to test whether, and how much, taxes can be reduced in 1950. For this purpose, as we have suggested, the relevant standard is how the budget would look under conditions of high employment. Accordingly, our estimates of 1950–51 expenditures and revenues, under existing or suggested programs, are estimates of what expenditures and revenues would be if we had high employment. We are not forecasting whether or not there will be high employment. Forecasts of economic conditions for 1950 and 1951, and estimates of what the budget picture would be under the forecast conditions, may be useful for some purposes. But under the logic of the position briefly explained in section I, and more fully developed in earlier policy statements, such forecasts are not relevant for deciding how high tax rates should be.

Expenditures

1. Unemployment compensation: Unemployment compensation payments for fiscal 1950 are now estimated at about $1,700,000,000. Under the standard high-employment conditions on which the CED budget is calculated, unemployment compensation payments would be about $1,200,000,000.[7]

2. Veterans life-insurance dividend: The fiscal 1950 cash-consolidated budget estimates include an expenditure of $2,800,000,000 for veterans' life-insurance dividends. This represents the dividends cumulated since the beginning of the program. No expenditure will be required for this purpose in fiscal 1951.

3. European Cooperation Administration: The Marshall plan carried out by the ECA is designed to give aid to European countries in the period of transition from a war to a peacetime basis. Our Government has advised the participating countries that the program will be terminated in 1952. The level of assistance has been cut already. If the original plan is followed, further cuts must be made in fiscal 1951. The economic recovery of western Europe indicates that this is possible. Expenditures for this purpose are estimated at $4,100,000,000 for fiscal 1950. Fiscal 1951 is the next to last year of the program. It seems reasonable, therefore, to reduce ECA expenditures for fiscal 1951 by at least $1,000,000,000.

4. Government and relief in occupied areas: Expenditures for government and relief in occupied areas in the fiscal year 1950 are estimated at about $1,000,000,000. This program is a declining one and must eventually be terminated. It is estimated that fiscal 1951 expenditures can be reduced $650,000,000 below fiscal 1950 levels. So large a reduction is possible because the cost of the German program will be paid for by ECA. For both ECA and government and relief in occupied areas reduction in expenditure levels depends upon the maintenance of stability in international affairs and the absence of a crisis requiring additional American aid.

5. Veterans' readjustment expenditures: The veterans' readjustment program in fiscal 1951 should cost less money than it did in fiscal 1950. If the program is confined to its original purpose of assisting veterans in their adjustment to civilian life, expenditures will decline as veterans complete the school, college, and on-the-job training provided for by the law. We believe that the program should be administered in accordance with a reasonable interpretation of this original, wise conception of its purpose. Certainly if this is done the program should not continue, after 5 years and $14,000,000,000 of expenditure, to cost the $3,000,000,000 it is costing in fiscal 1950. We believe that veterans' readjustment expenditures in fiscal 1951 should be about $2,200,000,000, approximately the figure originally estimated for fiscal 1950 in the President's January 1949 budget message. To some extent, expenditures for veterans' readjustment benefits go up when unemployment increases. Our $2,200,000,000 estimate, like the other 1951 estimates in this section, are estimates of expenditures under high-employment conditions.

[6] Revenues would be about $2,000,000,000 higher and unemployment compensation about $500,000,000 lower than in the Budget Bureau figures.

[7] This $1,200,000,000 was likewise the unemployment compensation figure in the budget in January 1949 which assumed sustained high employment in the succeeding year.

6. Postal deficit: The November budget estimates set the postal deficit for fiscal 1950 at $600,000,000. We believe that there is no reason for the general revenue to support a deficit of this size. The post office is a business-type operation and should pay its way. Substantial economies in the administration and operation of the postal system should be effected. With such economies and some increase in rates, $500,000,000 of the estimated $600,000,000 deficit can be eliminated for the fiscal year 1951. The $100,000,000 deficit would cover the costs of air-mail subsidies and governmental mail not properly chargeable against other users of the mails.

7. Home-mortgage purchases: The Federal National Mortgage Association (FNMA) was established to serve as a secondary market for the purchase of Federal-guaranteed home-mortgage loans from private lenders. In the last year, purchases of mortgages by FNMA have skyrocketed beyond anything contemplated at the beginning of the year. In the January 1949 budget, total purchases for fiscal 1950 were estimated at $200,000,000. The revised November 1949 estimates set the figure at $1,300,000,000. Although there has also been some increase in FNMA purchase of FHA guaranteed mortgages, the sharpest increase has been in the purchase of veterans' mortgages guaranteed by the Veterans' Administration. This is mainly the result of the fact that the present 4 percent interest rate on veterans' mortgages is out of line with interest rates prevailing in the market.

We believe that the flow of mortgages, especially veterans' mortgages, into FNMA could be greatly reduced without seriously restricting the supply of credit available for the purchase of houses. The most important step would be to increase the interest rate on new veterans' loans to bring it more in line with market rates and so to induce private lenders to hold more of the loans. Congress provided for the guaranty of veterans' home loans in order to help veterans get credit, and get it on favorable terms in relation to the market. The interest rate was set at 4 percent, but the Veterans' Administrator was given authority to raise the rate in the light of market conditions. We believe that it is not sound policy to hold this rate unchanged at 4 percent without regard to the market or the budget outlays required to assure a flow of credit at that rate.

A moderate increase in the interest rate on new mortgages, possibly accompanied by other technical changes in the system, would probably reduce the FNMA to a minor, emergency function, and greatly reduce budget outlays for the program. However, because of the large volume of FNMA commitments outstanding and the time that may be required for private lending institutions to take FNMA's place, we are calculating only that FNMA expenditures will be cut 50 percent—by $650,000,000—in fiscal 1951.[8]

[8] Footnote by Beardsley Ruml: The purchase of Government-guaranteed mortgages is a budget item of a peculiar character in that the principal of the mortgages is amortized and the interest rate paid to the Government is higher than the Federal Government pays on its own obligations. These outlays should either be refunded or considered part of the $3,000,000,000 surplus provided for in the CED stabilizing budget policy. There is no justification for taxes to provide the wherewithal to purchase Government-guaranteed mortgages.

8. National defense: By far, the largest single item in the Federal budget is the expenditure for national defense. Estimated in January 1949 to run at the level of $13,700,000,000[9] for the fiscal year 1950, the revised November estimates have lowered the sums to be spent in fiscal 1950 to $12,900,000,000. This is the result of praiseworthy efforts by the President, the Budget Bureau and the Department of National Defense. There are still opportunities for economy in the direct military budget; many of them have been pointed out by the Hoover Commission. We believe that realization of these economies would more than offset the rising expenditures for procurement already authorized, reducing total expenditures somewhat from fiscal 1950 to fiscal 1951. Achievement of $1,000,000,000 of additional savings, which we believe is feasible, would reduce total expenditures about $300,000,000, given the probable magnitude of increased procurement expenditures. Further economies beyond this should certainly be sought. However, it does not seem to us prudent to count on them until further information is available.

9. Farm price supports: In January 1949, the President estimated fiscal 1950 expenditures for farm price supports at $563,000,000. This estimate was revised in November to $1,400,000,000. This large increase in the estimate was attributed to the fact that 1949 crops were abnormally large. Since there is no basis for assuming above-normal crops in 1950, particularly with acreage reductions recommended by the Department of Agriculture, it might be reasonable to expect fiscal 1951 expenditures to fall below the $1,400,000,000 figure. However, the effect of the new farm legislation is raising support levels, and the possible reduction of foreign demands, may offset or more than offset this expectation. Also the extent to which farm production controls will be used to reduce the burden of price supports on the budget is uncertain. In view of these uncertainties, the most reasonable course seems to be to include in the 1951 budget the same $1,400,000,000 figure that is estimated for 1950.

The problem of farm price policy, of course, involves many considerations in addition to the budgetary costs. The farmer, like the veteran and others, has more to gain in the long run from sound fiscal and economic policies of Government to maintain high employment than from large subsidies. The committee is now studying the agricultural problem as a whole and expects to issue a statement on the subject in the spring of 1950.

10. Relatively fixed major items: Expenditures for interest, veterans' pensions, and benefits under the old-age, railroad retirement, and civil service retirement trust funds will total $7,600,000,000 in fiscal 1950. Minimum expenditures under these programs are controlled by existing legal and contractual commitments. It is estimated that expenditures in this area will rise by about $300,000,000 in the next year because of increased numbers of the aged drawing pensions and benefits. No allowance is made in this figure for expansion of the social security insurance program. During the past 4 years this committee has repeatedly urged broadening of the social security insurance program. However, it is likely that the additional costs of an expanded program would be matched, at least during the first year, by additional receipts from the social-security pay-roll tax. There are a number of proposals that would greatly increase Federal expenditures for assistance to the aged and other categories, by grants to States, or in other ways outside the social security insurance system. However, it is assumed and recommended that the insurance system will be our main reliance for increasing social security.

[9] Excluding the costs of the proposed universal military training program, which was not adopted by the Congress.

11. Economy in administration: Total expenditures can, in our opinion, be reduced $200,000,000 to $400,000,000 in fiscal 1951 by greater economy and efficiency in the administration of programs other than national defense, which we have already discussed. The reports of the Hoover Commission have called the attention of the public and the Government to possible expenditure reductions through reorganization, elimination of duplication, and tighter expenditure controls. Some of the Commission's recommendations have been put into effect and should begin to yield significant results in fiscal 1951. An outstanding example has been the establishment of the General Services Administration to centralize purchasing and other "housekeeping" functions. Other recommendations have still to be carried out. In addition, new fields need to be studied. For example, opportunities for economy may be revealed by a reconsideration of the privileges, such as leave, of Government, civilian, and military personnel, in the light of prevailing private standards.

12. Public works: The public-works program is one of the major problems in the budget, not only for next year but also for the longer future. The Budget Bureau has done commendable work, within the limits of its authority, in controlling public-works expenditures. Nevertheless, expenditures for this purpose about doubled—rising from $1,600,000,000 to $3,000,000,000—from fiscal 1946 to fiscal 1950 and there is a strong tendency for them to grow still further. An alarming aspect of this situation is that it threatens a repetition of the old pattern in which the volume of public works rises parallel to private construction, pushing boom trends higher and unstabilizing total construction activity.

We consider it of great importance that every effort should be made to hold down the rate of public-works expenditure in fiscal 1951. We believe that the whole public-works area should be resurveyed, with the immediate object of deciding which projects already authorized or even already started should be postponed.

In part the tendency for public-works expenditure to rise reflects pressure from local groups for projects which need to be held back in the national interest, however meritorious they may be when viewed locally. Many of these groups clearly recognize the need for sound budgetary policy. In this situation there is an opportunity for these groups to contribute directly to sound policy by self-restraint.

13. Reserve for emergency requirements: This policy statement is being written at the end of 1949, at the beginning of the annual budget-making season. We do not now foresee urgent need for expenditures in excess of those we have already recommended. If such a need should arise, every effort should be made to effect offsetting reductions in other expenditures. Nevertheless, in calculating how much tax reduction is feasible in 1950, it is the course of prudence to make allowance for expenditure requirements which are not now foreseen but which may have to be met. For this purpose we include an unallocated amount of $500,000,000 in our 1950–51 expenditure total. We are not recommending that this amount be spent. It should certainly not be spent unless absolutely necessary. We merely suggest that in thinking about the possibilities of tax reduction we should not regard this $500,000,000 as available until the expenditure picture is clearer.

Revenues

1. Calculation of yield under high employment conditions: Estimates of the revenue yield of the existing tax system as it would be under conditions of sustained high employment are the relevant figures for calculating the possibilities of tax reduction. Our objective is tax rates high enough to yield a moderate cash surplus at high employment. Inflation or depression would result in higher or lower revenues, but variations in revenues resulting from inflation or depression should not affect our decision about the proper level of tax rates.[10]

The November 1949 Budget Bureau estimate stated that 1950 revenues would be $3,000,000,000 below the revenue estimated in January 1949 because of "the moderate drop in prices, money incomes, and corporate profits since the original estimate was made." However, it appears that the entire $3,000,000,000 revision in the revenue estimates may not be legitimately ascribed to the decline from high employment. That is, it seems probable that the January 1949 estimates would have been somewhat too high even if employment had not fallen in 1949. We estimate that revenues in fiscal 1950 at a sustained level of high employment would have been $2,000,000,000 above the November 1949 Budget Bureau estimates.

2. Growth factor: The current tax rates would have yielded $43,700,000,000 in fiscal 1950 had conditions of high employment prevailed. The economy of the United States is dynamic and should continue to expand. Growth can be expected to result both from increases in productive efficiency and population during the next fiscal year. We estimate that at high employment current tax rates would yield $1,000,000,000 more in fiscal 1951 than in fiscal 1950 because of this factor.[11] Offsetting increases in expenditures resulting from population increase have been taken account of in the expenditure estimates.

3. Social-security program: Increases in the combined employer-employee tax under the old-age and survivors insurance program will take effect automatically on January 1, 1950. The combined employer-employee rate increased from 2 to 3 percent. The full effect of this increase will not be felt until the fiscal year 1951 as the higher rate will have been in force for only half the fiscal year 1950. It is estimated that the cash receipts from this source in fiscal 1951 will be $450,000,000 higher than in fiscal year 1950.

4. Enforcement: The Bureau of Internal Revenue has added or been authorized to add 6,000 persons to its staff. In addition, the Bureau is conducting a sampling study to determine the major areas of tax evasion. A conservative estimate of the additional revenue obtainable by stricter enforcement of tax laws indicates that from $200,000,000 to $400,000,000 can be obtained in fiscal 1951. This would be from one-half to 1 percent of total revenue collections.

CONCLUSION

The foregoing analysis of the 1950–51 budget is summarized in the table on page 27. If the suggestions made here are followed, cash expenditures under conditions of high employment would be about $40,000,000,000 in fiscal 1951—about $6,700,000,000 less than the current estimate for fiscal 1950. It should be pointed out that $2,800,000,000 of the decline represents completion of the nonrecurrent veterans' life insurance dividend and $500,000,000 is the estimated lower level of unemployment compensation payments. Of the remaining $3,400,000,000, half is accounted for by planned decline in foreign-aid programs. In the total reduction we suggest, restraining the increase of certain programs, such as public works, is just as important as reducing others, and often more difficult to accomplish.

We estimate revenues, at high employment, in excess of $45,000,000,000 in fiscal 1951. The excess of almost $4,000,000,000 over fiscal 1950 reflects mainly the higher yields that would be realized under conditions of high employment.

In total, our recommendations to this point would yield a cash-consolidated surplus under high employment conditions of $5,000,000,000 or a little more. As we have already pointed out, we believe that tax rates should be set high enough to yield a cash-consolidated surplus of $3,000,000,000 available for debt retirement under conditions of high employment. Accordingly, these suggestions point to the feasibility and desirability of a net revenue reduction of about $2,250,000,000. A tax reform program within this limit is developed in section III of this statement. If we do not have high employment in 1950 and 1951, following our recommendations will not yield a $3,000,000,000 surplus in fiscal 1951. If we have more than 3,500,000 to 4,000,000 unemployed, we would have a deficit. On the other hand, if we have high employment and rising prices, we would have a surplus larger than $3,000,000,000.

III. TAX REVISION FOR FISCAL 1951

More than tax reduction is needed at the present time. We need to remove inequities in the system and to achieve a better distribution of the burden of taxation. Tax reform should be the guiding principle in making any tax reductions that are possible.

In view of the limited reduction that is possible in fiscal 1951, a choice must be made among many reforms that are desirable. Reforms increasing revenues or costing little or no revenue have high priority, but the selection among the others which involve revenue reductions is difficult. However, differences over the favored first step toward revision should not prevent some steps being taken. The opportunity for revision and reform should not be lost through rate reductions of an expedient nature.

[10] Because of the lag in tax collections—particularly collections of corporate profits tax—revenues in fiscal 1951, even if that year is a year of high employment, will be reduced by the lowered national income of 1949. The yields revelant to decisions on tax policy, however, are the yields that would be realized in a sustained period—longer than a year—of high employment.

[11] This estimate is based on a 2 to 2½ percent annual growth in the national income. This would raise the national income by $4,500,000,000 to $5,500,000,000 in fiscal 1951 should high employment prevail. With the present tax system taking about 20 percent of the national income, an increase of $5,000,000,000 will yield $1,000,000,000 additional revenue.

Two classes of reforms are suggested. First, reforms involving little or no revenue loss. Second, reforms which are possible assuming around $2,250,000,000 of revenue reduction is available.

1. Reforms involving little or no revenue loss

Whatever pattern of expenditure evolves in fiscal 1951, reforms which provide increased receipts or do not decrease receipts should be enacted.

High on the list of this type of revision is the taxation of future issues of State and local bonds. Additional Federal revenues, possibly around $35,000,000, would be obtained in the first year and increasing sums thereafter. On the other hand, the cost of borrowing would rise for State and local governments. However, these considerations are minor by comparison with the gain in fairness and stimulus to private enterprise.

A second item is the revision of the treatment of business losses by both corporate and noncorporate businesses. Instead of the current provision permitting a 2-year carry-forward and a 2-year carry-back, a more equitable system would extend the period of carry-forward against subsequent earnings to 5 years. This would greatly benefit a new business which faces losses in its beginning years. This change would cost nothing for the first 2 years and little in the third year although revenue losses would follow at the rate of approximately $500,000,000 a year thereafter.[12] The benefit to small business and the encouragement to the risk taker makes such a revision worthy of immediate attention. To minimize the administrative problem of unsettled tax returns the period of carry-back should be limited to the previous year.

A third item on the list of reforms costing little or nothing is the revision of section 102 of the Internal Revenue Code applying a penalty tax to corporations that accumulate profits for the purpose of avoiding payment of individual income tax by stockholders. The law as it now stands has caused some uncertainty and confusion. Reasonable application of this principle should not interfere with the normal operations of businesses. The law should be amended to create a presumption that in the case of operating companies, profit accumulations are reasonable unless the Treasury shall prove the contrary. However, the unreasonableness of the accumulation, once established, should continue to be considered proof of purpose to avoid tax unless the taxpayer shall prove the contrary.

Fourth, the provision of the corporate income tax granting lower rates to corporations with incomes below $50,000 should be revised to eliminate the 53 percent "notch rate" on incomes between $25,000 and $50,000. This could be accomplished by applying a gradually rising scale of rates to the first $50,000 of income of all corporations.

Fifth, although revenue requirements will probably not permit any basic change in policy with respect to charging off capital assets for tax purposes, we believe the administration of the present policy could be improved to make its application more reasonable and clear, without significant loss of revenue.

Various other provisions of the Federal tax law should be carefully studied to determine whether it may be possible to improve the fairness of the tax system, prevent tax avoidance, and increase revenue. An important example is presented by the special optional allowances for percentage depletion which are granted to oil and gas wells; sulfur, coal and metal mines; and certain other mineral resource industries.

[12] There would be no cost in the first 2 years because a 2-year carry-forward is already in effect; there would be little cost in the third year because of the 1-year lag of corporate tax payments behind liabilities.

Another example is that of the uses made by exemptions granted to educational, charitable, and certain other types of organizations.

2. Reforms suggested assuming that about $2,250,000,000 of revenue reduction is possible

We believe that, barring a national emergency, about $2,250,000,000 can be made available for tax reform and revision in fiscal 1951. The immediate benefit to the economy will be greatest if the total reduction is applied to lowering excise tax rates and reducing the severity of the double taxation of corporate dividends.

Excise tax reduction: The committee has previously recommended elimination of all excise taxes except those on liquor, tobacco, and gasoline. Excise tax reduction cannot be carried this far under present revenue requirements. However, an important step can be taken next year by the repeal in whole or in part of the wartime excise rates that were designed to meet wartime necessities. We believe that in the order of $1,000,000,000 of net revenue reduction can be made available for revision of excise taxes.[13]

In selecting which excise taxes to reduce or eliminate in 1950 consideration should be given to the following factors:[14]

(a) Some of the taxes discriminate unfairly against particular industries.

(b) Taxes which enter into the costs of doing business—such as the taxes on transportation and communications—raise the prices of almost all commodities, including the necessities of life, and therefore particularly affect persons with small incomes. Moreover, such taxes may raise prices by more than the amount of the tax, resulting in a burden to the consumer out of proportion to the revenue yield.

(c) Many of the present tax rates were imposed or raised during the war to aid the war program and with the clear intention that they would be eliminated or reduced when the special need had passed. They should be eliminated as rapidly as revenue requirements permit.

The reduction of excise taxes according to these principles would reduce the extent of discrimination in the Federal tax system. Consumers would benefit from excise-tax reductions, as would workers, employers, and investors in the industries affected.

Reduction of double taxation of dividends: The reduction of double taxation of corporate income is recommended as the best means of encouraging risk-taking and enterprise. We recommend that the first 16.6 percent of the corporate income tax be considered a withholding tax on distributed profits, comparable to the present withholding of the income tax on wages. This 16.6 percent is the rate applied to the first bracket income under the individual income tax. When the stockholder computes his individual income-tax liability, he would include in his income his cash income plus the tax withheld by the corporation. The amount of the tax he pays would then be the tax on this total income, calculated in the ordinary way, less the amount of tax that had been withheld. The revenue cost of such a plan is approximately $1,000,000,000 at high employment levels.[15]

The benefits to be derived from such a revision will be spread widely throughout the Nation. In part, the benefits would be passed on in lower prices or higher wage rates. The stimulus to productive investment and equity financing would also benefit all persons in the country. It would raise the output of goods and services and strengthen the economy against instability—gains in which all would share.

[13] A clear distinction must be noted between the gross and net cost of excise tax reduction. The net revenue reduction from reducing an excise tax rate will be less, and may be much less, than the current yield of the tax. The reduction of the tax may increase employment and incomes, and so raise the yields of income taxes and reduce the costs of unemployment compensation.

[14] Footnote by Beardsley Ruml: The wartime excises and wartime increased excise rates of 1941, 1942, and 1943 should be taken as a package, excluding tobacco, gasoline, and alcoholic beverages. These rates were put on as a measure of wartime necessity; they are discriminatory, punitive, and employment-reducing—as they were intended to be. They have no place in a peacetime tax structure.

The Future of the Budget

The tax reforms we have recommended for 1950 would be only a step, although a long step, in the direction of tax improvement. There would still remain on the tax agenda further reduction of excise taxation, liberalization of the rules covering depreciation allowances, provision for averaging in the individual income tax, elimination of the taxes on intercorporate dividends and consolidated returns, and reduction of rates of individual and corporate income tax.

It may be possible to reduce expenditures in 1950–51 by more than we have suggested, and so to achieve some of these important additional reforms. If so, the possibility should certainly be grasped. Equally essential, we should look beyond 1950–51, and plan for the future tax reductions that wise policy will permit.

Real opportunities do exist for creating the conditions that will permit further tax reduction in the next few years. Present policy contemplates continued reduction of foreign aid expenditures. The veterans' readjustment program should soon have completed its major functions. Existing farm legislation provides for a gradual reduction of minimum price support levels and so would permit reduction of expenditures. The drive for greater efficiency in governmental operations should yield increasing results. Finally, growth of the economy would permit the same revenues to be collected with lower tax rates.

We should not make the mistake of assuming that because a future decline of expenditures can be visualized we can sit back and wait for the passage of time to drop tax reform into our laps. Opportunities exist; affirmative action will be needed to realize them.

1. We must make sure that the "declining programs" actually do decline. This is partly a matter of vigilance, to overcome the presumption that often exists in favor of last year's expenditure level, and the interests that build up around going programs. It is partly a matter of correcting conditions that give rise to expenditure requirements. For example, continued cooperation by the United States in measures to improve world economic conditions—by means other than financial aid—will help to assure further reduction of foreign aid expenditures.

2. We must exercise restraint in the expansion of new or growing expenditure programs. This does not mean no new programs. Declines in old programs and growth of productivity would permit some new programs. But it does mean that new programs must be introduced with moderation—with due regard for the capacity of the budget and of the economy. New programs often cost little at first but soon mushroom into huge expenditures—and once the expenditures have risen it becomes very difficult to reduce them. Expenditure proposals must be appraised in terms of their long-run consequences.

Restraint in the expansion of the budget is self-restraint. Many groups in the Nation are large and strong enough to make successful demands upon the budget—veterans, the aged, farmers, workers, businessmen. But all have more to gain from growth and stability of the economy than from excessive government expenditures in their behalf. Self-restraint is economic self-interest. But it is more than that. It is the duty of the citizen.

3. We must promote the growth of the economy. Increasing productivity—expanding the output of the economy—is the source from which we can get not only relief from our budget problems but also improved living standards, increased leisure and greater opportunities for work and development for all. The record of increasing productivity in the United States in the past hundred years is remarkable. But increasing productivity is not a law of nature, even in the United States. It is the product of certain economic and social conditions, that can be strengthened or can be destroyed. We have pointed out earlier in this statement that the present tax system greatly weakens the forces making for economic growth. It is because the American people have a great interest in rising productivity, as well as a great interest in elementary fairness, that tax reform is so vitally in the interest of the American people today.

APPENDIX E

THE CASH-CONSOLIDATED BUDGET

Since 1942 the annual budget document has contained a table entitled "Receipts From and Payments to the Public—Excluding Major Intragovernmental and Noncash Transactions.[16] This statement of Federal financial transactions is what is referred to as the cash-consolidated budget throughout this document.

As the title implies, the cash-consolidated budget is—

(a) A consolidated statement for the "whole Government"; and

(b) A statement of cash receipts and payments.

CONSOLIDATING THE ACCOUNTS

For purposes of defining the cash-consolidated budget, the "whole Government" includes the following accounts:

1. General and special accounts.

2. Wholly owned Government corporations.

3. Trust accounts (such as social security trust accounts).

4. Partially owned Government corporations and other special deposit accounts.

5. Clearing account for outstanding checks (excess of checks issued over checks paid).

6. Exchange stabilization fund.

The "administrative budget"—the budget now in most common use—is a statement of the general and special accounts and wholly owned Government corporations only. However, the budget document includes data for all the accounts listed.

THE CASH BASIS

The general meaning of the statement that the cash-consolidated budget is on a cash basis whereas the administrative budget is not may be shown by illustration.

In fiscal year 1947 the Federal Government issued $2,000,000,000 of armed forces leave bonds in payment of terminal leave to ex-servicemen. This was considered an expenditure in the administrative budget, but it was not considered an expenditure in the cash-consolidated budget because it was not a cash payment. In fiscal 1948, $1,200,000,000 of these armed forces leave bonds were redeemed for cash. This was an expenditure in the cash-consolidated budget but not in the administrative budget. From the standpoint of the administrative budget the redemptions in fiscal 1948 were simply debt retirement. In general, in the case of payments made by the issue of Federal securities, the administrative budget records an expenditure when the securities are issued and the cash-consolidated budget records an expenditure when the securities are redeemed for cash.

In fiscal 1948 Federal trust funds and corporations invested $3,000,000,000 in Federal securities. As the administrative budget is defined, these investments would be considered expenditures. However, these investments are not considered expenditures in the cash-consolidated budget. They do not involve payments to the public, but either—

(a) a transaction exclusively between the Treasury and a Government agency; or

(b) a purchase of Government securities in the market by a Federal agency, which is a transaction similar to debt retirement in its effects.

The main factors contributing to the net difference between the administrative budget and the cash-consolidated budget in fiscal 1948 are shown in table I.

TABLE I.—Main factors of difference between administrative surplus and cash-consolidated surplus, fiscal 1948

[Millions of dollars]

Surplus in administrative budget	8,420
Excess of receipts over cash expenditures, main trust accounts [1]	+2,725
Net accrual of interest on savings bonds	+536
Net redemption of terminal-leave bonds	−1,221
Net redemption of notes issued to International Bank and Monetary Fund	−913
Net reduction in clearing account for outstanding checks	−507
All other factors, net	−192
Surplus in cash-consolidated budget	8,848

[1] Old-age and survivors, unemployment, railroad retirement, veterans' life insurance.

The surplus in the cash-consolidated budget was $428,000,000 larger than the surplus in the administrative budget in 1948. This excess was much smaller than usual because of the large payments for the redemption of noncash securities—the terminal-leave bonds and notes issued to the International Bank and Monetary Fund. These payments were expenditures in the cash-consolidated budget, but not in the administrative budget. In the previous year, 1947, this situation had been reversed. The excess of the cash-consolidated surplus over the administrative surplus was unusually large in that year because the issuance of these same noncash securities was an expenditure in the administrative budget and not in the cash-consolidated budget. Table II compares the annual surpluses in the two budgets from 1937 to 1950.

Derivation of the cash-consolidated budget from the administrative budget: The relation of the cash-consolidated budget to the administrative budget may be shown more precisely by tracing the derivation of the cash-consolidated budget through three steps:

(a) Adding the other Government accounts to the administrative budget.

(b) Eliminating intra-Government receipts and expenditures.

(c) Converting expenditures and receipts to the cash basis.

The first step is shown in table III.

TABLE III.—Fiscal year 1948

4. Clearing account for uncollected checks	-------	507	−507
5. Exchange stabilization fund	-------	-------	-------

The addition of these accounts does not give the cash-consolidated budget because the expenditures and receipts figures are neither on a consolidated basis nor on a cash basis. Consolidation of the accounts removed from the figures certain wash transactions within or between accounts, leaving the balance unchanged, as follows:

To arrive at the "cash-consolidated" budget totals it is necessary to put the consolidated totals of table IV on a "cash" basis. The difference between the "cash-consolidated" budget and the budget of table IV, which is consolidated but not cash, relates (with one small exception) entirely to the treatment of certain public-debt transactions. In both budgets the distinction between debt transactions and other transactions is fundamental. Receipts from the issuance of debt are not considered budget receipts in either budget, and payments for the retirement of debt are not considered budget expenditures in either budget. Also debt issued for no cash issue price is not considered part of the debt. In both budgets an expenditure is a transaction that increases the total "debt minus cash balance" and a receipt is a transaction that reduces that total. The net surplus in either budget for any period is the amount by which the sum "debt minus cash balance" is decreased during that period. The difference between the two budgets relates to the definition and valuation of the debt.

There are three differences between the concept of debt as used in the "cash" budget and the debt concept of the "not cash" budget.

1. In the cash budget only debt held outside the Government, its trust accounts and corporations is considered as debt, whereas in the administrative budget all Federal debt outstanding is included, regardless of ownership. As a consequence, in the administrative budget the purchase of Government securities by a Government agency—even by a wholly owned corporation—is an expenditure. If the security is purchased directly from the Treasury there is an increase in the debt and no change in the cash balance; if the security is purchased in the market the cash balance declines and there is no change in the debt. However, under the "cash" budget definition of the debt, neither of these transactions is an expenditure. The direct purchase from the Treasury changes neither the debt nor the cash balance, while the purchase from the market reduces the cash balance and the debt equally. Because of the large investments of the social security and veterans' life insurance trust funds in Government securities, this factor is the most important continuing source of difference between the cash budget and the administrative budget.

2. In the cash budget debt is valued at its cash issue price whereas in the administrative budget debt is valued at face. For example, the terminal-leave bonds issued in fiscal 1947 were not issued for cash and are not part of the debt in the cash budget sense. The issuance of these bonds was an expenditure in the administrative budget, but not in the cash budget. The redemption of the bonds was an expenditure in the cash budget, but not in the administrative budget, where it was simply a debt-retirement transaction. Similarly, the accrual of interest on savings bonds is an expenditure in the administrative budget, and increases the debt in the administrative sense, but the accrual results in no expenditure and no debt increase in the cash budget. However, when the bonds are redeemed the cash payment for the accrued interest becomes an expenditure in the cash budget, and is debt retirement in the administrative budget.

3. In the cash budget, obligations of Government corporations sold in the market are part of the debt. Proceeds from the sale of such obligations are therefore not a budget receipt but a receipt from borrowing. However, since these obligations are not considered part of the public debt in the administrative budget, proceeds from their sale are considered budget receipts just like proceeds from the sale of any commodities the Government may own.

Table V shows how these differences in the treatment of the debt lead to the difference between the consolidated totals, given in table IV, and the cash-consolidated totals:

TABLE V.—Fiscal 1948

APPENDIX C

The withholding plan for the taxation of corporate profits involves two changes from present practice:

1. The corporation would get a credit against its corporate income tax equal to a fraction of dividends paid by it.

2. The corporation would serve as an agent for collecting at the source part of the stockholders' individual income tax on their dividends. The corporation would withhold part of the dividends it pays, and remit them to the Treasury.

Under the plan suggested on page 33, both the credit and the withholding would be at the same rate, i. e., 16.6 percent of dividends. Thus the credit received by the corporation would be exactly equal to the amount it withholds for the stockholders' tax liabilities. Consequently, the total amount paid to the Treasury by the corporation would be the same as under present law, regardless of dividend payments. But the corporation's payment would be made up of two parts—payment on its own account and payment on its stockholders' accounts. The proportion in which the total payment is divided between the corporation's account and the stockholders' account would depend upon the proportion of the total profits distributed as dividends.

The table shows total taxes paid by the corporation on $1,000,000 of profits, under varying assumptions as to amounts of dividends paid:

Dividends paid	Tax paid by corporation
		Withholding plan
	Present law (all for own account)	Total	Own account	Withheld for stockholders' account
0	$380,000	$380,000	$380,000	0
$100,000	380,000	380,000	363,400	$16,600
$200,000	380,000	380,000	346,800	33,200
$500,000	380,000	380,000	297,000	83,000
$620,000	380,000	380,000	277,080	102,920
$743,405 [1]	380,000	380,000	256,595	123,405

[1] Represents full distribution of earnings after tax and therefore minimum tax for corporation's own account.

For any given amount of dividends, the stockholders' individual income tax would be the same as under present law. However, the stockholders' cash receipts would be less (since part of his dividend has been withheld for tax) and his direct cash tax payments would be less (for the same reason). For any given amount of dividends the stockholders' income after tax, and cash receipts after direct cash tax payments, would be the same as under present law.

In summary, for any given amount of profits and dividends:

(a) The corporation's tax payment is unchanged but its own tax liability is less, because part of its payment is withholding for the stockholder.

(b) The stockholders' tax liability is unchanged, but his own payment is less, because part of his tax has already been paid by withholding.

(c) The combined payments, which will equal the combined liabilities, will be less by 16.6 percent of the amount of dividends.

The way in which the withholding plan would work may be illustrated by considering the case of a corporation that earns $1,000,000 and pays $500,000 of dividends.

	Present law	Withholding plan
COMPUTATION OF CORPORATE PROFITS TAX
A. Corporate profits before tax	$1,000,000	$1,000,000
B. Dividends paid	500,000	500,000
C. Tax at 38 percent of profits	380,000	380,000
D. Credit for dividends paid (16.6 percent of B)		83,000
E. Corporate tax (C–D)	380,000	297,000
PAYMENT OF DIVIDENDS
F. Total dividend declared	500,000	500,000
G. Withheld for stockholders' tax (16.6 percent)		83,000
H. Dividend paid in cash	500,000	417,000

The computation of the stockholders' tax in the above case may be illustrated by the case of a single individual, without dependents, who receives one-tenth of the dividends of the corporation and has no other income.

	Present law	Withholding plan
I. Cash dividend received	$50,000	$41,700
J. Dividend withheld at source		[1] 8,300
K. Taxable income (I+J)	50,000	50,000
L. Tax on K at individual rates	22,568	22,568
M. Paid by withholding		8,300
N. To be paid directly by stockholder	22,568	14,268

[1] Stockholder may either receive notice from corporation telling how much has been withheld, or compute amount of withholding at 19.9 percent (16.6/83.4) of cash dividend received.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a very excellent editorial which was published in this morning's Washington Post, entitled "CED Budget Plan."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CED BUDGET PLAN

The Committee for Economic Development has outlined a budget program that would cut Government expenditures by 6.7 billion dollars, making it possible to reduce taxes about two and twenty-five one-hundredths billion and create a surplus of three billion for debt retirement in a year of high employment. The recommendations for reductions in Government outlays appear to be entirely feasible, though in some cases legislative authorization would be required to effect them. As the CED report explains, $5,000,000,000 of the proposed reduction in expenditures would be brought about by elimination of nonrecurrent outlays for veterans' life-insurance dividends, planned declines in foreign aid, and lower unemployment compensation payments, assuming employment reaches maximum levels next year.

Tax reduction recommendations, including revision of excise-tax rates, partial elimination of double taxation of dividends, and changes in methods of computing taxable corporate net income are high on the priority list of most advocates of tax reform. Although any substantial reductions in tax burdens should be deferred until Government spending has been drastically curtailed, the CED's emphasis on the imperative need for lightening the burden of taxation at an early date is calculated to spur economy efforts, and underline the importance of a cautious and selective tax reform program aimed primarily at removal of inequities.

The CED program is based on a novel principle of budget planning that makes it seem somewhat unrealistic from the viewpoint of the average man. For 1950–51 receipts and expenditures figures are based on estimates of what income and outgo would be at very high levels of employment (specifically with only 2,500,000 of the labor force unemployed). If unemployment is above 2,500,000, actual budget receipts may diverge widely from the estimated returns and deficits may result. That would not necessitate changing the CED recommendations, since under its so-called stabilizing budget policy, the surpluses of years of maximum employment are expected to cancel out the deficits of bad years.

The policy of annual budget balancing unquestionably accentuates business fluctuations, deepening depressions and encouraging tax reduction or extravagant spending in boom years. Consequently, the CED advocates setting tax rates at levels that would produce surpluses in years of high employment. It favors retention of those rates, regardless of the state of business, unless there are compelling reasons for reducing taxes or major changes in national policies or in economic conditions that require tax increases. This stabilizing budget policy is, in our opinon, a sound theoretical approach to solution of long-range budgetary problems, though the political obstacles to its acceptance as a guiding principle for budget making are formidable.

CED budget figures are also based on the cash budget instead of the administrative budget. Since the latter includes many interagency transactions that do not affect the amount of money held by the public, it cannot be relied on to measure the inflationary or deflationary effects of fiscal operations on the general economy. To be sure, the administrative budget will always be indispensable as an administrative control agency; it also provides information that is essential to an understanding of the long-range financial position of the Government. Without such a guide, spending projects whose initial cost is slight might develop into burdensome future commitments. The cash budget, however, showing the actual amount of money received from and paid to the public in any given year, including payments into and out of insurance trust funds, gives a much clearer picture of the immediate effect of Government spending and taxing on the general economy.

The CED's stabilizing budget policy and its use of the cash budget method of presentation are innovations that Congress may well study as an aid to better understanding of budgetary problems. Moreover, the CED suggestions for curtailing expenditures and correcting tax inequities deserve consideration on their merits, regardless of whether budget estimates are fitted into the framework of a stabilizing cash budget or the administrative budget.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, in offering this editorial for the RECORD I do so with my sincere compliments to the Washington Post, because I think here is an editorial analysis of the Federal budget problem that deserves the careful reading and study of every Member of the Senate. I wish to read a paragraph or two from the editorial and make brief comments thereon. The editorial says:

Tax-reduction recommendations, including revision of excise-tax rates, partial elimination of double taxation of dividends, and changes in methods of computing taxable corporate net income are high on the priority list of most advocates of tax reform. Although any substantial reductions in tax burdens should be deferred until Government spending has been drastically curtailed, the CED's emphasis on the imperative need for lightening the burden of taxation at an early date is calculated to spur economy efforts, and underline the importance of a cautious and selective tax-reform program aimed primarily at removal of inequities.

The CED program is based on a novel principle of budget planning that makes it seem somewhat unrealistic from the viewpoint of the average man. For 1950–51 receipts and expenditures figures are based on estimates of what income and outgo would be at very high levels of employment (specifically with only 2,500,000 of the labor force unemployed). If unemployment is above 2,500,000, actual budget receipts may diverge widely from the estimated returns and deficits may result. Tha would not necessitate changing the CED recommendations, since under its so-called stabilizing budget policy, the surpluses of years of maximum employment are expected to cancel out the deficits of bad years.

The policy of annual budget balancing unquestionably accentuates business fluctuations, deepening depressions, and encouraging tax reduction or extravagant spending in boom years. Consequently, the CED advocates setting tax rates at levels that would produce surpluses in years of high employment. It favors retention of those rates, regardless of the state of business, unless there are compelling reasons for reducing taxes or major changes in national policies or in economic conditions that require tax increases. This stabilizing budget policy is, in our opinion, a sound theoretical approach to solution of long-range budgetary problems, though the political obstacles to its acceptance as a guiding principle for budget making are formidable.

Mr. President, in its latest report the Committee for Economic Development simply restates its position on a so-called stabilized budget that is set forth in such great clarity in its earlier reports. Without taking further time to discuss the principles of a stabilized budget, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in my remarks a brief excerpt from a speech I made on this general subject of taxes in the Senate on September 30, 1949, on the subject of a stabilized budget—what is it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SALTONSTALL in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The key to a program that will promote stability, Government economy, and debt reduction without requiring impossible accuracy of forecasting business fluctuations is this:

Set tax rates to balance the budget and provide a surplus for debt retirement at an agreed high level of employment and national income. Having set these rates, leave them alone unless there is some major change in national policy or condition of national life.

Tax rates, by themselves, do not determine how much revenue will be collected.

The rates merely say, for example, that revenue will be $9 per gallon of liquor sold, $38 per $100 of corporate profits, $50 per $100 of individual taxable income within a certain bracket, and so on. How much will be collected with these rates depends upon the amount of liquor sold, the amount of corporate profits, and the amount of individual incomes. Since all of the important elements of the tax base are closely related to the national income, collections under any system of unchanging tax rates will be larger as the national income rises and smaller as the national income falls.

Some kinds of Government expenditures also tend to vary automatically with economic conditions. Unemployment compensation payments are the outstanding case. When unemployment rises these payments also rise, and when unemployment drops the payments decline. In addition, some expenditures—such as public works—may be advanced or held back to meet changing economic conditions within the limits of an agreed total expenditure program.

With tax rates set to yield a moderate surplus at high-employment national income larger surpluses will result when the national income is above that level. At lower national incomes the surplus will be smaller and below some point there will be deficits.

Under this system surpluses arising when national income goes above the standard high-employment level should not be used to increase expenditures. Likewise, a reduction of tax rates without a corresponding reduction of expenditures would be contrary to the policy, regardless of the actual surplus at the actual national income (subject to exceptions that will be stated below).

A direct consequence of the stabilizing budget principle is that fluctuations in the national income do not call for fluctuations in tax rates, or in expenditures except for the automatic response of some expenditure items. However, changes in tax rates or expenditures will be appropriate under some circumstances. If, for example, improvement of the international situation should lead to a substantial reduction in annual expenditure for defense, a lowering of tax rates would be appropriate. Similarly, if a new program is to be adopted that will substantially raise the annual level of Federal spending, higher tax rates will be required.

Three exceptions should be noted to the general principle that tax rates and expenditures should only change up or down in step with each other:

1. With a growing population and rising productivity, the national income at high employment will gradually rise. Therefore, the yield of a constant system of tax rates at the standard high-employment national income will also slowly and steadily increase. This gradual increase of tax yield will permit, without higher tax rates, some gradual increase in normal Government expenditure that may accompany the growth of the population and the national income. Moreover, as the economy grows into higher income levels, the amount of debt reduction consistent with high employment and stable prices may increase also; if so, the increased yield of the tax system should be retained for that purpose. Any readjustment of tax rates made possible by the long-time growth of the tax base should be made at reasonable intervals, say, 5 years, in order to avoid the unsettling effects of annual rate changes.

2. From time to time an urgent need may arise for an extraordinary expenditure that is large in amount but known to be temporary. It would probably be undesirable to raise tax rates sharply in order to finance such expenditures currently, and then to cut tax rates when the expenditure ceases. A plan for meeting these expenditures over a somewhat longer period would therefore be appropriate. This plan might take the form of a smaller tax-rate increase, extended over a longer period.

If the expenditure is in the form of loans, the repayments may provide the source from which the expenditure will, in the end, be met. Whatever the plan for ultimately financing the expenditure, any immediate inflationary consequences of the expenditure should be offset by anti-inflationary borrowings. Outlays under a program for foreign rehabilitation may fall within this exception.

3. The recommendations of this report are presented in the belief that, if they are combined with appropriate measures in other fields, economic fluctuations can be confined to moderate departures from a high level. Yet it would be foolhardy to ignore the possibility that we may again confront an economic crisis of great magnitude—either severe depression or major inflation. Some extraordinary action must and will be taken if such a crisis appears. An emergency congressional reduction or increase in tax rate (perhaps with a fixed, automatic termination date) would then be one of the most effective and least dangerous of the available courses.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I want to point out that we cannot have a stabilized budget unless we have a fair and just tax structure. We have a great many inequities in our existing tax system. In this matter of inequities in our present tax structure we find two general types of inequities that appear many times in the Federal tax structure as of today. First, taxes that are not based upon ability to pay, and, second, taxes that are based upon the principle of economic vulnerability. We cannot justify a tax structure which fails to carry out in a fair, equitable, impartial way the principle of ability to pay. We cannot justify the maintaining in our tax structure of tax principles or inequities based upon economic vulnerability. The wartime excise taxes at least, roundly criticized by the Committee for Economic Development in its latest report, are a good example of taxes based upon economic vulnerability. They are not based in many instances upon a fair application of the principle of ability to pay. One need only read the report of the committee which I have inserted in the RECORD to see how sound are the arguments which call for drastic revisions of most of our excise taxes.

I would call the Senate's attention to the fact that in its latest report the Committee for Economic Development restates its position for the elimination of many of the excise taxes and the reduction of many of the excise taxes not completely eliminated. Excessive excise taxes on liquor and tobacco are good examples of a tax based upon economic vulnerability. There has been a tendency on the part of the Congress, as well as on the part of State legislatures and some municipal councils, to take advantage of certain economic groups in the country who manufacture a product to which some persons are opposed. In those instances the power to tax has been abused to the point that the tax is almost a device for prohibiting manufacture or consumption. Of course, I refer to liquor and tobacco taxes. As one who neither smokes nor drinks, I think I am at least in a position to pass judgment on the question of whether the principle of economic vulnerability is applied to an excessive degree in the case of excise taxes on liquor and tobacco. In all fairness, Mr. President, we cannot justify, from the standpoint of a comparison of taxes placed on other goods, the exceedingly high taxes now imposed upon liquor and tobacco. The situation is so bad that recently, at a political meeting, a representative of the WCTU arose—I am not in a position to say whether she spoke officially for the organization—and proceeded to argue for a substantial reduction in the excise taxes on liquor because she claimed that they have become so unreasonably high and are producing such a large income for the Federal Government that they are setting back the movement for prohibition in this country. It was a rather novel argument, I thought. I present it here, however, to illustrate that we have gone so far with our Federal taxes and our State and municipal taxes on both liquor and tobacco that even those who would like to prohibit the consumption of liquor and tobacco entirely are apparently coming to recognize the unfairness of the taxes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I am happy to yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The same argument might be applicable to the taxes on oleomargarine.

Mr. MORSE. I am going to vote for the elimination of the oleomargarine tax, I am glad to tell my friend the Senator from Arkansas. I shall support an amendment which will protect the public from misrepresentations in the sale of oleomargarine.

Mr. President, I have referred to excise taxes in order to show that many of them do illustrate the fixing of taxes on the principle of economic vulnerability rather than ability to pay. Many of our transportation taxes are based on economic vulnerability and not ability to pay. The same goes for excise taxes on baby oil, cosmetics, and similar items.

I would personally go further than the latest report of the Committee for Economic Development goes with respect to the elimination of excise taxes. I do not think its present recommendations go far enough. I think more of the excise taxes should be entirely eliminated; I think more of them than the committee recommends should be reduced substantially.

But at least the committee has given a specific proposal, one which is affirmative and constructive, and one which I think should outline the least my party should advocate by way of tax reform with respect to excise taxes.

In its report, released just this week end, the committee, on page 1, says this:

1. There will almost certainly be a large deficit—probably around $5 billion—in the Federal budget for the fiscal year 1949–50. Even if high employment had been continuously maintained throughout 1949, there would be a deficit for 1949–50.

2. Because of its size—over $40 billion—and its composition, the present Federal tax burden is a serious impediment to economic growth and a source of important inequities among individual taxpayers and among industries.

3. Federal outlays increased $10,000,000,000 from fiscal 1948 to fiscal 1950. While particular items of expenditure will certainly decline in the next year, there are strong pressures for increases in many parts of the budget.

I think in 1950, with our national income what it is, and with the very heavy tax load the American people are already carrying, we, as a Congress, cannot justify a budget which involves a deficit of $5,000,000,000.

I happen to be one who believes that the budget can be balanced without doing any serious damage or detriment to the desirable objectives the President of the United States has in mind, so far as advancing the welfare of the people of this country is concerned. I happen to be one who believes that the Republicans on this side of the aisle cannot justify going before the American people in the 1950 elections unless at this session of Congress they lay down a specific, affirmative program showing how the $5,000,000,000 can be saved without doing serious detriment to the standard of living and the welfare of the American people.

Mr. President, I am of the opinion that it is up to the Republicans in the Senate to "put up or shut up" in regard to this matter of fighting for a sound economy. I am satisfied that we can put up a sound budget program that will balance the budget, will not jeopardize desirable social and economic programs that should be carried on by this Government for the welfare of the people, and will demonstrate to the American people that we are a party that has a constructive program for stabilizing the economy and protecting the value of the dollar.

I wish to say that the first part of that program, the first affirmative proposal we should offer, is the adoption of this report of the Committee for Economic Development, which has come to the desk of each Member of the Senate over the week end. As one Republican, I shall ask time and time again in the Senate during this session, of my Democratic colleagues on the other side of the aisle, What is wrong with the specific recommendations of the Committee for Economic Development in the field of budget making and tax revision?

Mr. President, the time has come to carry this fight to the Democrats. The time has come for the Republicans to ask the Democrats, "What is wrong with adopting the specific recommendations of the Committee for Economic Development?"

We have dillied and dallied, Mr. President, ever since the Seventy-ninth Congress, on this question of taxation. We let the Democrats in the Seventy-ninth Congress proceed with what I think was a very unsound budget-making program. Then we Republicans took over, in the Eightieth Congress. But we did not do one whit better when it came to the development of a sound tax program and a sound budget-making program. In the Eightieth Congress we had before us the scholarly, sound report of the Committee for Economic Development; but those of us who proposed it and offered legislation to carry out its terms did not even get a hearing in the Eightieth Congress. We received the same treatment in respect to these tax recommendations as we had received in the Seventy-ninth Congress.

Of course, that is water over the dam and under the bridge.

Now the time has come, in this Eighty-first Congress, to make very clear to the American people that the Republican Party stands against continuation, in times of great prosperity and high income, of a deficit-spending program which characterizes the budget proposals of the administration today.

So, Mr. President, I repeat, what is wrong with these recommendations of the Committee for Economic Development? Let the Democratic administration tell us what is wrong with them. Let it carry its case for deficit spending against a tax revision and budget-making program so sound that I have yet to hear an outstanding tax economist in America raise any valid criticism against the tax revision and budget-making programs of the Committee for Economic Development.

Mr. President, we have to do more than that, as a party, if we are to demonstrate to the American people that we propose to see to it that our economy is stabilized, that the value of the United States dollar is protected, that the injustices, unfairnesses, and inequities of our tax structure are removed. We are also going to have to demonstrate to them that we will operate on a business-like budget in conducting the business affairs of the Federal Government.

In addition to the so-called stabilized budget, which for some years now has been recommended by the Committee for Economic Development, I point out that another specific recommendation the Republican Party should adopt at this session of Congress is a budget which separates administrative costs of government from capital investments.

Mr. President, no great business in this country attempts to operate on the type of budget set-up upon which the Federal Government presently is operating. No great corporation in the United States mingles into a hodgepodge form operating costs and capital investments. This afternoon the President of the United States in his budget made, in my judgment, some exceedingly excellent recommendations in regard to capital investments. His recommendations for the construction of great, self-liquidating, wealth-creating projects in the United States are economically sound, and the Republican Party should grasp those recommendations and should give the President the support to which he is entitled when he makes sound recommendations, just as I would have the Republican Party oppose him with the same vigor when he makes suggestions which cannot be justified on their economic facts.

Mr. President, the solution of the fiscal problems which confront this country is not to be found in higher and higher rates of taxes. The solution is not to be found in new taxes imposed upon existing wealth and existing income. Part of the solution for our fiscal problems is to proceed with those capital investments necessary to create the new wealth that will expand this economy of ours, out of which we can get the new taxes, and the new jobs and the new sources of income created by these new capital investments.

So, Mr. President, I think another thing the Republican Party should stand for as a part of a stabilized budget is a budget which separates capital investments from operating costs. A budget which makes clear to the American people that when they consider the problem of deficit spending, they should eliminate from their calculations all self-liquidating, wealth-creating projects which will return to the Treasury of the United States, over the years, many times their original cost. Such projects should not be considered in terms of balancing a budget dealing with operating costs of Government because they create Government income far in excess of their original costs.

The next thing I would suggest is that the Republicans in this session of the Congress recognize that the Hoover Commission's recommendations are consistent with one of the basic planks of the 1948 platform of our party. The program of that platform calls for the reorganization of this Government of ours on a sound economic basis. The platform principles are in keeping with the Hoover Commission's aims. Therefore I recommend to my party this afternoon the adoption of the major Hoover Commission recommendations for the reorganization of the executive branch of our Government in the interests of promoting greater economy in the operation of the Government.

I have been a little at a loss to understand how some of my Republican colleagues have not been so enthusiastic about the Hoover Commission reports as I think they should be. I wonder whether it is because they are strong for economy in every other fellow's State or district but their own. I suspect that whenever any specific recommendation of the Hoover Commission might step on some economic toes in their own State or district, some of my associates in the Senate on both sides of the aisle lose their ardor for economy. I wonder whether that is part of the explanation for their lack of enthusiasm in joining some of us who would like to make the Hoover Commission recommendations a part of the Republican Party's economy program for the Federal Government. Oh, I am not committed to those reports in the sense that I shall advocate their adoption without change. If the evidence can be brought forward that shows that some particular section of the reports needs to be modified in the interest of economic fact and sounder policy I shall vote for such amendments. But I think, Mr. President, that my colleagues on the Republican side of the aisle have delayed too long in making clear to the American people that the Republican Party intends to stand, as a matter of policy, with the major recommendations of the Hoover Commission reports, subject only to such modifications as evidence clearly presented to the Senate shows should be made in the interests of economic soundness.

Next I suggest that we make clear—and it may not be politic to do this, but I still believe that the American people expect Members of the Senate of the United States to act on the basis of the facts, not on the basis of political expediency—that we intend to cut budgets wherever savings can be made without injuring the public interest. I would have the Republican Party tell the American people that they must make use of a leather punch right in the middle of their economic belts. They must punch some new holes in those belts, to make way for a belt buckle that will permit of a greater tightening of Government expenditures. I use that figure of speech to illustrate a very deep economic conviction of mine, namely, the debt that presently plagues the American people is a debt which must be paid in much more substantial amounts than we have been willing to pay it in the last few years. I know there are those economists—in my judgment, false economists—who are trying to sell the American people a bill of economic goods, that it is a good thing to have this very high national debt. They argue that the amount of the debt is not of great significance, if the national income continues to increase. But, of course, there is income and income. There is money or dollar-sign income, and there is real income. In all these discussions of national income I would have my colleagues in the Senate think and talk in terms of real income, as we talk in terms of real wages. When we speak of real wages we talk not in terms of money wages, but in terms of what the income of the worker will buy.

We have got to pay the debt in much greater amounts than we have been willing to pay it to date if we are to increase the real income of the Nation and the individual taxpayer. One only has to read this report of the Committee for Economic Development in order to see the direct economic relationship between the debt, taxes, and the take-home money that is left to the individual citizen. If we further cheapen the American dollar—and that is what we are doing with it by not paying off this debt—if we further cheapen the American dollar so that it will not be even the 49-cent dollar that it presently is, according to the latest figures that I have seen based on 1939 values—we will be guilty of defrauding the American people. Debasing the value of the American dollar by deficit spending amounts to a form of confiscation of property values. It amounts to a form of repudiation of governmental obligations by sleight-of-hand budget making manipulations. It does not set well with the American people and they are protesting it all over this Nation today. So I recommend to the Republican Party this afternoon the very sound recommendation of the Committee for Economic Development, that we proceed to pay the debt, even though it means new holes in our economic belts, even though it means somewhat of an economic squeeze that may not be particularly comforting to the American people for a time. Some men in high office ought to be willing to take whatever political chances are involved in carrying this point of view to the American people, and tell them quite frankly that in this time of high prosperity and high income the American people ought to be willing to pay a larger share of the debt than has been paid to date.

Further, I ask the Republican Party to be willing to tell the American people the specific types of tax changes that they would make. Oh, I have been told that it is not good policy to suggest that double taxation of stock dividends should be removed, because after all the average man and woman does not own any stocks, and that they are perfectly willing to permit double taxes on the stock dividends of those who do own them. But let me say to those Republicans who would even argue from that political standpoint, that they are overlooking the fact that the average American citizen is characterized by a sense of fairness. Once he is made to understand the injustice and unfairness of double taxation on stock dividends, he will say to the Congress, "Remove that injustice." Incidentally, once he understands the restrictive effect of these tax inequities on his own wages, on his own farm prices, on his own personal income; once he comes to understand the effects of these inequities pointed out in this excellent report upon our economy, he will react against any political party which has failed to try to correct such tax injustices. Once he sees the throttling effect upon incentive, the tendency to restrict the investment of venture capital, the tendency for investors to bury their money in tax-exempt securities, I can hear him say all over this land: "Of course, not only the Republican Party but the Democratic Party as well ought to proceed to remove these tax inequities."

Let me mention one or two others, Mr. President. Let me mention this proposal of the committee for a substitution of 5 years carry-forward on losses for the present confused system of carry-backs. I want to say, if the Republican Party would take this tax issue to the American people, dry as the subject is supposed to be, and let the average voter see the relationship for example of the present tax provisions in respect to carry-backs and the benefits that would flow into the economy by the adoption of a 5-year carry-forward on losses, we would find great political support for adopting this particular recommendation of the Committee for Economic Development. The American people will recognize the economic soundness of the program which the Committee for Economic Development has been recommending if we as a political party have the wisdom to adopt it as party policy.

Then, Mr. President, there is the abuse of two types of escape from taxes. There is escape from taxes through tax-exempt securities which the Committee for Economic Development recommends should be eliminated, on the theory that where American citizens enjoy the economic benefits of our capitalistic system and our political democracy, they should be willing, as good citizens, to put their money to work for the benefit of that economy. They should not seek to escape from their full and fair share of the tax load by being allowed to invest in tax exempt securities.

Thus, Mr. President, I recommend to the Republican Party that we take a valiant stand in opposition to a continuation of this type of tax evasion loophole known as the tax-exempt security loophole.

Then there is another tax-evasion loophole, Mr. President, which has been enlarging itself at a very rapid rate in recent years. It is the charitable trust. I say, Mr. President, that the charitable trust has become actually a tax-evasion racket in America. Of great charitable institutions with great social objectives I find myself in as much ardent support as could be any Member of this body. But when any charitable institution uses the corporate charitable trust primarily for the purpose of evading taxes and through this tax-evasion legal device cheats the rest of the American taxpayers by escaping a reasonable tax load, then it is time for the Congress to call a halt to such a practice. The time has come for the Congress of the United States to have courage enough to step in and say, "We are going to look behind the veil of these charitable trusts; we are going to pierce the veil and see what the purpose of the charitable trust really is."

I say it is not fair, Mr. President, to permit these great charitable trusts, under existing tax laws, to operate competitive businesses with free-enterprise businesses and be exempt from paying their fair share of the tax load necessary to support this Government.

I recommend to the Republican Party, Mr. President, that it take a forthright stand on this proposition and in this session of Congress support legislation which makes perfectly clear that tax exemptions for charitable institutions shall be narrowed to the operation of the institution itself and shall not extend to a business conducted by the institution in competition with private enterprises.

I am perfectly willing to take all the criticism that may flow from the statement I made a moment ago, and I repeat it so everyone will know I spoke advisedly. I say that the charitable trust is being used by many institutions in this country as a legal device to avoid tax obligations. It has come to constitute a tax-evasion racket which should be eliminated by legislative action.

There is another great loophole of tax evasion in this country. Authorities seem to differ as to the extent of tax evasion which goes on by those persons who just deliberately evade paying their taxes on one pretext or another. We are advised that there are many who just do not file accurate tax statements. They are gambling on the fact that the internal-revenue officials will never catch up with them.

I have in my hand, Mr. President, an excellent editorial on the subject of tax loopholes, published in the Denver Post for December 20, 1949, entitled "Tax Loopholes Drain Our Business Strength." I ask unanimous consent to have it printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAX LOOPHOLES DRAIN OUR BUSINESS STRENGTH

We again are being told that Congress is about to resurvey the whole question of Federal taxation with a view to plugging the loopholes through which billions of dollars of income are escaping taxes each year.

Since 1943, when Congress first showed a genuine interest in the question of legal tax-dodging, we have been told the same thing many times. We can only hope that this time it really is true. The growth of tax-exempt business in recent years has been phenomenal. It has put an added and unfair burden on competing businesses which do not enjoy exemptions. Coupled with the system of double taxation on business profits, it constitutes a growing threat to national welfare.

Tax loopholes are of many kinds. A number of them arise from a section of Federal law which excepts from income taxes the net income of various corporations, funds, and foundations operated for religious, charitable, scientific, and educational purposes.

The original intention of that provision was laudable enough but in recent years that special exemption has come to cover many activities not originally contemplated. For example, many businesses ranging from department stores to piston-ring-manufacturing companies now are owned nominally by colleges and universities.

Supposedly the tax-exempt incomes from those businesses is to go for educational purposes. Actually, the colleges and universities may receive some income from those sources but by escaping Federal taxes those companies often are able to lay aside large amounts for plant expansion and are able to pay handsome salaries to their executives. Competition from such tax-exempt firms is difficult for purely commercial tax-paying companies to meet.

Some churches also own businesses now and the number of private foundations and trusts which support various charitable and scientific endeavors in order to escape taxes and pay good-sized salaries has increased by leaps and bounds.

Cooperatives and labor unions control other businesses, ranging all the way from oil wells to retail stores, which enjoy a tax-free income of more than $10,000,000,000 a year, an income gained in competition with tax-paying businesses.

Still another loophole—created by a tax formula adopted in 1943—has made it possible for insurance companies to escape taxes on about $4,500,000,000 worth of earnings on such things as real estate in the last 3 years.

In these times of high taxes, when legitimate business is having difficulty finding the money for needed expansions, a heavy obligation rests on Government to see that taxes are distributed fairly and justly.

Experts vary in their estimates of the amount which might be collected if all tax loopholes were plugged. The estimates run from $1,000,000,000 a year upward. It is high time for Congress to tackle this problem seriously regardless of whose toes may be trampled.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, here is a way to save money. I do not know whether the estimates of possible savings are accurate. I have no way of knowing. I have read estimates from reliable sources, from Government officials who have testified before our Appropriations Committee in times gone by, when they wanted more appropriations for more personnel in the tax-collecting divisions of the Government. Some of these witnesses have told us there is a great amount of tax evasion in this country. Some of the estimates, Mr. President, run from one billion to two billions of dollars which could be collected if we paid more attention to providing more adequate machinery for the collection of taxes due this Government.

I say, Mr. President, that the Republican Party ought to make it one of its planks of policy that it is unalterably opposed to any form of tax evasion, and that it stands for the strictest administration of existing tax laws. If the Government would crack down on all kinds of tax evasion we would find a great saving could be accomplished thereby. As much possibly, as two billion dollars could be saved if we collected all the taxes due the Government.

I close, Mr. President, by saying that here is an opportunity for the Republican Party to take a constructive, affirmative stand so that no one in respect to the tax, at least, would have any justification for saying, "Well, I should like to vote for the Republican Party, because I think we need a change of administration in Washington, but I just do not know what the party stands for."

In the Eighty-first Congress let us, by legislative action, Mr. President, make very clear to the American voters exactly what we stand for in terms of specific proposals in connection with each one of the great issues confronting the American people.

I have spoken this afternoon only on the tax issue, but as the session proceeds I intend to suggest to the Republican Party some other specific programs and proposals which should be adopted into law. We cannot afford to let the Eighty-first Congress close its session without having written on the floor of the United States Senate a specific legislative program on each one of the great issues which confront the American people. I suggest that a good place to start is with the tax program of the Committee for Economic Development. I repeat my question to the Democrats. "What is wrong with that program?"

To the Republicans I say, let us get busy and support it in the Senate of the United States. The people want action in bringing about economy—not just talk about economy. If the Republican Party in the Congress, if we Republicans who are on the firing line in this session of Congress will give the people some action by doing our best to get the Congress to adopt a sound tax-revision and budget program as recommended by the Committee for Economic Development we will provide part of the answer to the question, "What does the Republican Party stand for?" Then if we will offer equally sound proposals on each of the other issues facing the American people we will not have to worry about which party will win in the 1950 elections. I think it is up to us. I think the Republican Party can and must meet this great political challenge.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I merely wish to observe at this point that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] did not speak today, as he intimated on last Friday he would speak, on the oleomargarine bill. I am very interested in hearing what he has to say about that bill, and I hope he will find it possible to speak on it tomorrow.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] has been attempting all day long to obtain the floor to discuss the unfinished business, the oleomargarine measure. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate convenes tomorrow the Senator from Minnesota may be recognized by the occupant of the chair at that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, January 10, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JANUARY 9, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, the source of all that makes life useful and hopeful, we thank Thee that Thy providence continues through this, another day. Be with us, that we may walk in Thy favor and in the ways of Thy commandments, and comfort us with Thy approval.

We bless Thee for the shelter and the hallowed associations of the home; for our country, so rich in privilege and so broad in opportunities. Bless all institutions that sustain and support our national life, and may we never fail in our loyalty to the land that honors us.

Through the years, blessed Lord, give good health and great wisdom to our honored Speaker, that he may continue to serve our Nation with wise statesmanship. We pray in the Master's name. Amen

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 6, 1950, was read and approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 417).

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the following-named Members be, and they are hereby, elected members of the following standing committees of the House of Representatives:

Committee on Armed Services, JAMES T. PATTERSON, of Connecticut.

Committee on Un-American Activities, BERNARD W. (PAT) KEARNEY, of New York.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COTTON ACREAGE QUOTAS

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, let me congratulate the Agriculture Committee of the House of Representatives on the speed with which it is moving to amend the 1949 act which established cotton acreage quotas. This is extremely important. Many complaints are reaching the Congress daily regarding the enforcement of this act. I am satisfied that the inequities and injustices created are not defendable and that if the program is to work properly some immediate changes are demanded. Unfreezing the unused cotton acreage and stipulating a requirement that no farmer should be cut more than 30 percent of his normal cotton acreage are changes which will be welcomed by farmers who now feel that the act is harsh, unfair, and very unjust.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LARCADE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances; to include in one an article by Francis Douglas appearing in the Sunday Washington Star; in one a letter from Homer Brinkley, manager of the American Rice Growers Association, and newspaper articles; and in one a copy of a letter from one of his constituents.

Mr. CAVALCANTE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article appearing in the Morning Herald, Uniontown, Pa.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a press release.

Mr. DEANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a telegram from Mr. Kline and a reply from the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. KEE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article appearing in the Christian Science Monitor.

Mr. PATMAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in four instances and include statements and excerpts.

Mr. KEATING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. RICH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include editorials.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. PATMAN asked and was given permission to address the House today for 15 minutes following any special orders heretofore entered.

Mr. RICH asked and was given permission to address the House today for 15 minutes following any special orders heretofore entered.

RECORD SHOWS WE ARE LOSING THE COLD WAR

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks and include a letter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, are we winning the cold war? Let us take a look at the score:

In January 1945, Moscow ruled 190,000,000 people.

In June 1948, Moscow ruled 450,000,000 people.

In November 1949, Moscow ruled 800,000,000 people.

The 1949 figure was proudly proclaimed by Commissar Malenkoff at Stalin's birthday celebration last December.

Now I ask you again, are we winning the cold war? The answer is obviously "No." Right now we are on the losing team.

Under a bankrupt foreign policy, in that same period, we have lost face, prestige, and position, but more it has cost the American people the staggering sum of $33,070,200,648. I have secured these figures from the Library of Congress.

The total postwar aid from July 1, 1945, to January 1, 1950:

July 1, 1945–June 30, 1949	$26,725,320,619
July 1, 1949–Jan. 1, 1950	6,344,880,029
Total	33,070,200,648

And now we are about to recognize the Chinese Communist Government. This must not be, and the American people should rise up and be heard. Let the British appease but not the United States.

Are we winning the cold war?

The letter referred to is as follows:

QUEENS COUNTY CHAPTER,
CATHOLIC WAR VETERANS,
Jamaica, N. Y., January 3, 1950.

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: At the start of the new Congress we bring to your consideration two matters of vital importance to the welfare and security of the United States.

There is agitation by Communists, fellow travelers, and appeasers that the United States should recognize the communistic government of China. Would this not be a betrayal of the people of China and the Far East? What a blow to the great patriotic and statesmanlike work Gen. Douglas MacArthur has been doing to hold the bridge from communism in Japan and other far eastern outposts. What a blow or betrayal it would be to the security of the United States and the Philippines.

Regarding Spain, we have the same agitators by Communists, their fellow travelers, and even socialistic Government of England and France against the recognition of this friendly country which has been and is today a bulwark against communism in Europe. Is it not time that our own State Department stop being influenced in their foreign policy by the socialistic and communistic countries or by trying to appease them?

There are reports that these communistic and socialistic groups, realizing they cannot bring about the recognition of communistic China, and realizing they cannot stop the recognition of the Spanish Government, will throw their forces to bring about a compromise by recognizing the communistic China Government and also the Spanish Government. We know you will agree that any such compromise would be a betrayal of principle and what is right. We hope you will do all in your power to stop any such appeasement of these alien groups and fellow travelers.

We would appreciate your early views on these two matters which are so vital to our welfare and national security. Is it not high time that the State Department make their decision and act in accordance with what is right and what is in the interest of the United States?

Hoping you will give these paramount matters your consideration and attention,

Respectfully yours,

WILLIAM H. O'NEILL, Commander.

BE NIFTY AND THRIFTY IN FIFTY

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, for years I have been trying to associate with the membership here and get them to follow me on one thing, economy in government. I asked the question many, many times during past years when I saw how fast we were spending money, as to where we are going to get the money. I never got a favorable reply.

Then I changed the theme last year, and I said the thing to do now is to try something else on the membership, and maybe I can get them to stop spending. And I said many times, "Be wise and economize." But you kept on spending and spending.

Now this year I want to make a new motto, and I hope that I will get a little aid and assistance, especially on my right here in the House, "Be nifty and thrifty in fifty."

I hope this brings results in economy in operation of our Government.

Help me out; will you? Our country needs it; wise government demands it. Act accordingly.

DEFICIT SPENDING

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, as the year 1950 opens the national debt of the United States stands at $257,000,000,000. Indications are that debt by next June will exceed $260,000,000,000.

Federal Government spending during the present year is at the rate of $43,500,000,000 annually. The President says he wants to reduce this spending to about $42,000,000,000 for the year which starts next July 1. Even if this modest goal is attained, spending still will be about four billions a year, or about $12,000,000 a day, above the Government's tax income.

The end of deficit, red-ink financing is not yet in sight. A government, like a private family, that constantly goes further and further into debt, inevitably meets up with disaster. With the family, that disaster is bankruptcy. With a government, the end is either national bankruptcy or ruinous runaway inflation.

A national debt of $257,000,000,000 is a sum so astronomical that it defies human understanding. In simpler terms that debt is an average of $1,800 a person for every man, woman and child in these United States. It is equivalent to a debt of $7,200 for every average family of four in this Nation.

Yet, despite the staggering financial burden of this enormous debt and the heavy burden even payment of the interest on that debt imposes on every American family in added income, excise and other taxes and in the increased costs of living, we continue to spend profligately more than $42,000,000,000 a year.

HOW MUCH IS $42,000,000,000?

Federal expenditures under George Washington averaged $4,261,000 a year. The $42,000,000,000 which President Truman wants to spend next year would have operated this Government at the George Washington rate of spending for 10,000 years. What the Truman administration now spends in a day would have operated the Federal Government in George Washington's time for 25 years.

Federal expenditures under Abraham Lincoln, including all of the cost of the Civil War, were $838,000,000 a year. The $42,000,000,000 which President Truman proposes to spend next year would have operated our Federal Government for about 50 years at the Lincoln administration rate of spending. The Truman administration in one peacetime week of 1950 spends as much as the Lincoln administration did during an entire 12 months during the Civil War years.

Federal expenditures during the Woodrow Wilson administration, including all the costs of World War I, averaged $5,867,000,000 a year. This year's $42,000,000,000 budget of President Truman would have operated this Government for 7½ years at the Woodrow Wilson World War I rate of spending.

As recently as 1930, only 20 years ago, Federal taxes were only $29.54 a year per capita. Today under the Truman "spend, spend, spend and tax, tax, tax program," Federal taxes, income and hidden, average $315 a year for every man, woman, and child in the Nation.

Is it not time to stop and to consider where we are going? Tax dollars can be obtained only from the sweat and toil of those who work. All taxes must come from the production of farm and factory, trade and transportation. We cannot spend ourselves into prosperity. We can tax ourselves into ruin, for the power to tax, unwisely used, destroys. History is filled with examples of nations that were impoverished, weakened, and destroyed by unsound fiscal policies. We should profit by these examples.

I once asked a banker to measure the height of a pile of 1,000 $1 bills. The pile was 4 inches high.

Now had those bills been of $1,000 denomination, there would have been $1,000,000 in that pile and it would have been 4 inches tall.

A billion dollars is one thousand million. Therefore a billion dollars in $1,000 bills would be a pile 1,000 times 4 inches in height or 4,000 inches or 333 feet tall.

We will spend this year $42,000,000,000. It, therefore, would require a pile of $1,000 bills 42 times 333 feet tall or 13,986 feet high to contain enough $1,000 bills to provide the money to meet the President's spending program for the coming year.

The national debt, now $257,000,000,000, is approximately six times the amount the President asks for his coming year's spending program. To pay off that national debt would require a pile of $1,000 bills six times 2½ miles tall or a pile of $1,000 bills that would extend 15 miles into the sky.

A friend suggested that I should have worked out my figures with $1 bills thereby showing that to pay off the present national debt would require a pile of $1 bills that would be 15,000 miles high.

The top of that pile is still not in sight for we are increasing our Federal spending, not decreasing it, and our Federal debt will continue to mount higher and higher unless we change our present dangerous course toward bankruptcy or inflation.

Biggest battles of the present session of Congress will be waged over the appropriation bills. This is as it should be. Maintenance of wartime spending and wartime taxes in peacetime just does not make sense. The demand for greater efficiency and greater economy in Government is coming from every section and segment of our American population.

Even Trumanites who throughout the Eightieth Congress and in the first session of the Eighty-first Congress, resisted all efforts at economy and fought all demands for tax reduction, have been impressed by the growing demand for more Government efficiency and less Government spending. Some of them now say they will go along with a curtailment of spending if it is kept within modest limits.

Most of these, however, would confine their reductions in expenditures to foreign aid and to the military. Reductions in these two activities, unquestionably, are in order. One of the best places, however, to cut spending is in the ever-multiplying Federal agencies with their ever-expanding number of employees. The Hoover Commission report recommends this. I was disappointed that the President in his state of the Union address made no mention of the Hoover report or its recommendations or of the possibility of curbing the size and cost of our Gargantuan bureaucracy.

Twenty years ago, according to the Hoover report, we had 300 bureaus and commissions in our Federal Government. Today, says the Hoover report, there are 1,816. Twenty years ago, says the Hoover report, there were 570,000 civilian employees on the Federal pay rolls. Now we have 1,988,600.

The General Accounting Office of the Federal Government about a year ago reported no less than 29 Federal agencies engaged in loaning money, 3 in insuring bank deposits, 34 engaged in acquiring land, 16 in wildlife preservation, 10 in Government finance and credit, 12 in home and community planning, 28 in welfare matters, 4 in bank examinations, and 65 in gathering statistics.

No sensible person surely can believe that all of these overlapping agencies are either necessary or desirable. The multiplicity of these agencies can lead only to confusion, chaos, and inexcusable waste.

Some of our colleagues on the Democratic side, when anyone suggests reducing Federal spending, inquire skeptically, "Where would you cut expenditures?" My answer is, I would cut them everywhere waste in Government can be found and waste can be found today almost everywhere in Government.

OUR PRESENT-DAY COAL SHORTAGE

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, coal is essential for American industry. Without coal there can be no coke; without coke, very little steel; without steel, no autos. And so it goes. Every vital industry in America depends very largely upon a coal supply.

When a strike develops in the coal fields the results are first felt by the railroads with the loss of freight revenues; next by the steel and cement companies that require great quantities of coal for their conversion processes; then by the auto industry, the largest users of steel in the Nation; and finally by the public utilities who furnish heat, light, and power. When the coal shortage hits the public utilities in our metropolitan centers, it means brown-outs and black-outs, and so forth.

John L. Lewis and his 500,000 miners, therefore, have a stranglehold upon practically all of American industry. When the 500,000 miners go on strike several million other workers are made idle for lack of coal, and the whole economic life of the Nation becomes disrupted and disorganized.

WHAT CAN BE DONE ABOUT IT?

Mr. Speaker, under the Taft-Hartley Act the President has the authority and the responsibility to protect the national health and safety of the general public when those rights are threatened by any labor controversy that creates a national emergency.

The President must decide first whether or not the strike affects the national health or safety. If in his judgment it does, then he must appoint a Board of Inquiry to investigate the dispute and report back to him. He may then, if he deems it necessary, obtain a temporary injunction against the strike, lock-out, or walk-out. After the injunction is secured the parties involved in the labor dispute must continue production for 60 days during which period the original Board of Inquiry makes a new study of the dispute, and furnishes a complete report which is made public. Within 15 days after the report is made public the National Labor Relations Board is required to take a secret ballot among the workers to determine whether the rank and file want to accept the employer's last offer. After the secret ballot is taken, then if the controversy is not settled, the President must report the matter to Congress with a recommendation for new and more stringent legislation to control labor controversies in which the Nation's health and safety are threatened. What is wrong with this provision of the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. Speaker, my people want to know why the President does not act in the present emergency? Why he does not use the machinery the Congress gave him to use for just such an emergency—a shortage of coal that is causing untold suffering, and threatens the national health and safety?

MENTAL PATIENTS IN VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION HOSPITALS

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include two editorials and a statement by the Veterans' Administration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, we hear a great deal about what should be done for the veterans. I call the attention of the House to a report issued by the Washington Office of the Veterans' Administration which states that one-third of the more than 52,000 veterans who are mental patients in Veterans' Administration hospitals have not been visited by members of their own families or friends in a year or more.

According to this report, preliminary results of a survey being conducted by the Psychiatry and Neurology Division of the Veterans' Administration's Department of Medicine and Surgery show that in some hospitals nearly half the mental patients had not had a visitor in a year, and in one hospital only 219 patients out of 785 had visitors during the same period.

As you all know, interest in the mental cases, particularly by the families, in many instances means a cure. If the families have not enough love and appreciation of what their own soldiers did, it is a great pity. I shall introduce a resolution in the House of Representatives and I shall ask Gen. Carl R. Gray, Jr., Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, to continue the work in behalf of the mental patients in Veterans' Administration hospitals by making a report to Congress concerning the financial accounts of the patients and how much each individual patient was allowed for his own personal benefit during the past year and how much of the patient's money went to relatives, guardians, conservators, and others. I shall also ask that the Veterans' Administration take steps to interest the relatives and friends of the patients to visit them at regular and frequent times when it would be advisable and helpful.

The failure of relatives and friends to visit the patients is most hard-hearted and the newspapers throughout the country in news items and editorials have called the neglect of the veteran patients pitiful, earnestly asking help for them.

I shall read the following editorials:

[From the Boston (Mass.) Traveler of December 29, 1949]

THE LIVING DEAD

Have you, in your family, one of the living dead? Have you in some mental hospital for veterans one who is comfortably out of sight and out of mind—your mind? There are 52,000 such veterans in America and one in three has not seen a member of his family this year.

We know there are explanations and excuses, sometimes valid ones. But in the name of human decency and charity, put your explanation and excuse to the acid test. If they will not stand it, admit that you have failed of charity. Admit it, before it is too late. Make a new year's visit, and make it subject to regular and frequent renewal.

[From the Lowell (Mass.) Sun of December 29, 1949]

THEY LIVE ALONE

More than one-third of the 50,000 patients in mental hospitals under the supervision of the Veterans' Administration have not been visited by anyone in the past year.

These men who lost their minds through shock or injury while fighting for their country have been left entirely alone by the outside world; they have been completely forgotten by relatives and erstwhile friends. They are truly the forgotten men of the times.

The VA has made a detailed study of all patients in veterans' hospitals and has produced this startling revelation. There are many patients in this group who frequently have rational periods but who are not well enough to be released; what must they think, in the brief periods that they are able to work their minds clearly, about this neglect on the part of their friends and relatives?

The VA believes that in many instances an occasional visitor might help mend the minds of these unfortunate men who certainly deserve greater consideration.

This may help many people to remember these isolated veterans when making up their new year resolutions.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION,
INFORMATION SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., December 28, 1949.

One-third of the more than 52,000 veterans who are mental patients in Veterans' Administration hospitals have not been visited by members of their family or friends in a year or more, Veterans' Administration said today

Preliminary results of a survey being conducted by the Psychiatry and Neurology Division of the Veterans' Administration Department of Medicine and Surgery showed that in some hospitals nearly half the mental patients hadn't had a visitor in a year, and in one hospital only 219 patients out of 785 had a visitor during the same period.

Dr. Harvey J. Tompkins, Chief of the Psychiatry and Neurology Division, said that while some of the patients have no known close relatives, most of those covered by the survey have families.

Visitors might be disturbing to some patients, Dr. Tompkins explained. However, in the vast majority of mental cases in Veterans' Administration hospitals visits by relatives and friends are beneficial to the patients.

Long periods of isolation from the outside world may be detrimental to a patient, not only while he is in the hospital but also when he leaves the hospital and attempts to reestablish himself in the community, Dr. Tompkins said.

In many cases, Veterans' Administration said, there was a tragic lack of interest on the part of the patients' relatives. Many patients had been hospitalized for extended periods—some had been in Government hospitals since World War I—and their families have just drifted away from them. In other cases, the families want nothing to do with "crazy" men.

Files of the hospital psychiatric social workers are full of case histories of the Nation's "forgotten" veterans. Some of these records reveal instances where the families refuse to accept the veterans back into the home even after they have recovered. Thus, there are men in Veterans' Administration hospitals who are mentally and physically capable of returning to a normal life and, in some cases, earning a living if they could return to their homes and families.

Typical of the case of the "forgotten" veteran is Mr. Y. Diagnosed as a dementia praecox case, Mr. Y has been in a Veterans' Administration hospital since 1944, and during that time he has had but one visitor, an older brother. He has been on "full privileges" for a long time and works diligently at any treatment activity prescribed for him.

More than a year ago a trial visit to his home was recommended for him by the doctors at the hospital, but Mr. Y's relatives could not be persuaded to accept him, although the hospital and the patient have continued to write to them many times since then. His mother has written a few times, but the letters are gloomy and simply emphasize the fact that no one wants him. Despite such letters, Mr. Y still dreams of some day returning to his few acres of land where he can once again see his family and friends.

Then there is the case of Mr. X, a man of 58, who was admitted to a Veterans' Administration hospital in the fall of 1944. He was married and the father of several children. During the years he has been hospitalized, Mr. X has been ignored by his family. They have neither written to him nor visited him.

Sensitive about this disinterest on the part of his relatives, Mr. X has adopted a family. It consists of the ward physician, whom he foundly calls "Dad" or "Uncle George," and the social worker handling his case who is either "Baby" or "Baby Dear." If Mr. X doesn't see one member of his family every day, he becomes depressed and reveals his feeling of being unwanted.

Veterans' Administration hospital managers and staffs are generally in agreement that visits by relatives and friends to most of the forgotten men would have some therapeutic value. Here's what happened when the Veterans' Administration social worker in the hospital decided to do something about the situation.

At one large Veterans' Administration hospital where the survey on visits was made, a patient, who is always friendly to the hospital personnel, had seen no relatives since his admission to the hospital 12 years ago. The Veterans' Administration worker learned from him that he had a brother, and she began attempts to locate him. The brother was located in Florida and wrote to the patient, enclosing a $10 bank note. They exchanged photographs and letters. Hospital attachés said the patient valued the signature on his brother's first letter more than he did the money which had been sent to him.

At another Veterans' Administration hospital, where 600 of the 1,700 patients had not been visited in a year, a World War I veteran who had not had a visitor in 12 years, asked the social worker if it would not be possible to contact a relative or friend and request them to visit him. His case file showed his wife had divorced him and remarried. His three sons are grown, but the social worker located two of the sons in a nearby city. Their response was enthusiastic. One wrote immediately:

"I received your most welcome letter concerning my father. I have been led to believe that he remembers nothing or any person from his past. I have been told it would be useless to see him or write him. I will be there to visit him, Saturday, the 17th, in the morning."

When the son arrived, the ward doctor introduced father to son. The reunion, the doctor said, was truly heartwarming, and as a result of this first visit alone, the patient has made a better hospital adjustment.

In an attempt to interest families of patients in one VA hospital, the social-service department contacted the families of a selected group of 16 patients by mail or through the VA regional office. Fourteen families responded with visits.

As a result of the survey, Veterans' Administration announced it would intensify its efforts with the cooperation of the voluntary services committee at the hospital level with the objective of further stimulating the interest of families and friends in Veterans' Administration's forgotten men.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LODGE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and include extraneous material. He was informed by the Public Printer that the material in one of the extensions would exceed two pages of the RECORD at an estimated cost of $191.34, but was given permission to print it notwithstanding that fact.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD in two instances, and in one to include an appreciation of Gen. John Thomas Taylor by the National Tribune, and in another the speech made yesterday by Mme. Chiang Kai-shek.

Mr. GOODWIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include extraneous material.

Mr. WOODRUFF asked and given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. LEFEVRE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article.

Mr. McGREGOR asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include a letter and a newspaper article.

Mr. RIEHLMAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. LECOMPTE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial and a letter.

Mr. LEMKE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a short resolution by North Dakota veterans.

Mr. CURTIS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. REED of New York asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in five instances, in each to include extraneous matter.

Mr. JACOBS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MADDEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a speech made by William Green at the centennial celebration of the birth of Samuel Gompers.

Mr. NORRELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement by Millard D. Gibbs entitled "Your President and Mine."

COTTON ACREAGE ALLOTMENTS

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of last Friday and last Wednesday, I included tabulations of the cotton acreage allotments of 1942 compared with the cotton acreage allotments of 1950. I invite all of you who have any cotton problems to study carefully those tabulations. They show, for example, some of the counties—nearly 100 counties—have more acreage allotment than they did in 1942, whereas others have lost 80 percent or more of their allotment since 1942.

Some of our problems are very serious. I read from a letter which was written on January 3 by the Secretary of the county PMA committee of Smith County, in my district. This is what he says:

Number of genuine cotton farmers that will be forced to quit farming in Smith County, due to the 1950 cotton allotment formula—500.

That is, it is estimated Smith County, Tex., is going to lose about 500 farmers. Van Zandt County is perhaps losing 600 farmers. I quote one sentence:

The committee feels that approximately 600 farmers will be forced to quit farming because of the reduced cotton allotments.

We hear talk about full employment. If you think such conditions as these are going to be conducive to full employment, you have another think coming. I repeat what I have said before—unless this cotton acreage law is materially changed, there is to be serious difficulty in some sections. The Congress is going to hear a great deal about this. I do not refer to myself, but to the farmers in many of the cotton areas of this country.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
College Station, Tex., January 6, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: As requested in your letter of December 21, I am attaching a tabulation showing by Texas counties the estimated additional cotton-acreage allotment that would be required if present legislation were amended so that no 1950 farm allotment would be less than the larger of 70 percent of the 1946–48 average acreage actually planted as determined by the county committee, or 50 percent of the highest cotton acreage and war crop credits in the years 1946, 1947, and 1948. The summary also shows the estimated acreage allotment that farmers would willingly release to the county committee for reapportionment to other farms in the county if such authority was given the Secretary.

The tabulation shows the estimated additional acreage allotment that would be required if only the 70-percent plan was authorized and if only the 50-percent plan was authorized, in addition to the larger of the two plans.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: In reply to your letter of a few days ago, in which you requested information relative to the cotton allotment situation in Smith County, the following is submitted:

1. 1942 Smith County cotton allotment: 58,000 acres.

2. Number of acres we would have to redistribute, if the unused 1950 allotment could be used: It is estimated that about 1,000 acres would be released by farmers for redistribution.

3. Number of acres that would come from genuine cotton farmers who cannot continue to farm because of too little acreage: It is doubtful if any acres would be released by such farmers, as they would merely reduce the number of tenants on the farm, so that a reasonable crop could be had by each tenant.

4. War crop credit: Smith County would receive about 3,000 additional acres if this credit were granted.

5. Number of genuine cotton farmers that will be forced to quit farming in Smith County due to the 1950 cotton allotment formula (including tenants): It is estimated that at least 500 will be forced off of farms due to insufficient cotton acreage.

Hoping this to be the desired information, and should additional information be needed don't fail to call on us.

For the county committee:

DAN G. OWEN,
Secretary, Smith County PMA.

Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: In reply to your letter of December 29, 1949, in which you made inquiry relative to the number of acres available for allotting to new cotton farms the following information is submitted:

1. Number of acres available for new farms: 600.

2. Number of farmers that have requested this acreage: 250.

3. Number of cotton farms requesting this acreage: 250.

The number of farmers and farms requesting this 600 acres are figures as of today. It is expected by the dead-line date from 500 to 1,000 farms and farmers will have made application for a part of this allotment set aside for new farms.

Yours very truly,

DAN G. OWEN,
Secretary, Smith County PMA.

Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH:
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: In reply to your letter of January 3, 1950, this is to inform you that the county committee of Smith County did set aside a reserve for those farms that were not eligible for cotton allotments, due to lack of cotton or war crop history during the years of 1948, 1947, or 1946. Inasmuch as the total allotment granted this county was only 14,510 acres, the reserves set aside for upward adjustments on hardship cases, corrections of errors, lates, and for new farms are very small.

In Smith County there were 2,190 known cotton farms eligible to share in the regular allotment. In Smith County there are about 5,600 farms, which means that approximately 3,400 farms were not eligible to share in the regular allotment.

Prior to the war about 3,600 farms grew cotton in Smith County and planted yearly about 56,000 acres.

Your question as to the number of old farms and new farms that are making application for the reserves set aside for farms not eligible for regular allotments is not clear; however, it is estimated that by the final date for making such application at least 500 to 1,000 farms will have applied for a part of the reserve set aside for new-grower allotments.

The total reserve set aside in Smith County was 1,616 acres; of this 438 acres were used to adjust upward hardship cases whose allotment was from 5 to 15 acres, 570 acres were used to adjust upward hardship cases whose allotment was 15 acres and above. This left only 608 acres for those that may apply as new-grower farms. One hundred and one acres were reserved to take care of lates and for correction of errors.

Trusting this to be the desired information, I am

Sincerely,

DAN G. OWEN,
Secretary, Smith County PMA.

Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: The county committee would like to make the following answers to your recent questions regarding the cotton allotment in Van Zandt County.

1. Total 1942 cotton allotment: 84,580 acres.

2. Total 1950 cotton allotment: 36,388.9 acres.

3. Distribution of unused acreage—The county committee feels that unless some special incentive be given for release of unused acreage prior provision would only release approximately 300 acres for redistribution. They feel that too many farmers will hold their allotments hoping to be able to rent them until it is too late to do anyone much good. If a special incentive such as credit for cotton history were given to the person releasing the acreage and this was done early enough, a considerable acreage would be released. Approximately 700 acres.

4. The committee feels that approximately six hundred farmers will be forced to quit farming because of the reduced cotton allotments. We also know that there will be several hundred others who will be forced to rent other farms with small allotments or no allotments at all. They will be forced to divert their acreage from cotton to some other cash crop. This of course will be truck crops in this area and you can imagine what will happen to the market for these crops due to the increased production all over east Texas.

5. War-crop credit: In 1945, 785 farms received credit for 577.4 acres war crops and 69 farms received credit for 905.7 acres GI credits. In 1946, 908 farms received credit for 7,019.3 acres war crops and 40 farms received credit for 552.9 acres GI credits. In 1947, 933 farms received credit for 7,625.1 acres war crops and 24 farms received credit for 250.3 acres of GI credits.

We have been told that our county allotment was figured by taking 95 percent of the 1947–48 average cotton acreage. If our 1947 war crop and GI credits were added to our 1947 cotton acreage and the procedure followed our allotment would be increased by approximately 3,740 acres. This of course would help, but would on an average increase cotton allotments at the rate of only 2 acres per 100 acres of crop land. It would help the county as a whole, but the individual farmer would scarcely realize that he had received any increase.

6. The committee feels that approximately 600 farmers will be forced to quit because of decreased cotton acreage; they also feel that several hundred more will be forced to divert to other crops, causing over-production of these crops.

7. The county reserves of new-grower farms is 427.7 acres. We are sure that at least 500 farmers will make application for new-grower allotments. You can see from this that only a token allotment can be given to these farmers.

The committee feels that the individual farm allotment in the county should have been set by the same procedure that the county allotment was set. That is, a percentage of cotton history instead of a percentage of cropland. They feel that a limit of not over 40 percent of cropland in cotton should have been added to the law as they know that no farmer in this county needs or wants more than 40 percent of his land in cotton each year. They feel that the allotments set up in east Texas on a percentage of cropland figure were not only harmful, but ridiculous. Adjoining counties in the blackland and in west Texas got more than they expected or needed while we were cut almost below the point where we can exist and counties joining us on the east and south were cut clear out of the cotton business. We do not believe that this was the intention of Congress or that it is the purpose of the marketing quota program.

Hon. Congressman LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This is in answer to your letter dated December 29, 1949.

The county committee set aside 250 acres out of the original allotment of 8,843 acres, for new growers. However, the total allotment for the county finally was 10,173.5 acres compared to 31,300 planted acreage in 1941 on 2,744 farms. Allotments were set up on 1,438 farms in 1950. These are farms that either grew cotton or war crops in 1946, 1947, and 1948 out of a total of 3,459 farms for Upshur County.

According to our records that were obtained from farmers in the spring of 1949 we have 211 farms that grew cotton in 1949 for the first time in several years and for that reason, according to the law, no cotton allotments were set up for these farms. To date, we do not have forms to take application for new growers' allotment. We are of the opinion that most of the farmers who grew cotton for the first time in 1949 will want a cotton allotment for 1950 and no doubt there will be farmers that have not grown cotton since 1941, 1942, or 1943. Compared to the number of allotments set up for 1950 and the number of farms which grew cotton in 1941, the acreages for Upshur County are out of line.

According to reports in newspapers, I have noticed that a bill is planned to be introduced in Congress, whereby no farm would get less than 70 percent of the average acreage grown on the farm in the years 1946, 1947, and 1948, or 50 percent of the highest acreage in either of the above 3 years whichever is the largest. This provision will not help this country but a very little; because we had to adjust the reported acreages that the farmers reported to this office downward so much to come within the acreage given by the so-called BAE figures.

The following is how the reported acreage compared with the acreages given for each of the years by BAE:

	Acres
1946:
Farmers reported	9,998
BAE acreages	3,880
Difference in acreage	6,118
1947:
Farmers reported	12,095
BAE acreages	6,150
Difference in acreage	5,945
1948:
Farmers reported	13,113
BAE acreages	8,850
Difference in acreage	4,263

You can readily see that where these acreages were adjusted down to within the figures given by BAE, we did not have very much acreages left. We did not think and still do not think that the farmers made that big a mistake in reporting the acres of cotton grown in the county.

The cotton allotment for this county is so small that it is going to be hard for many farmers to get financial help from banks or other loan agencies. Numbers are coming in daily saying that they cannot possibly get by on the allotment set up for them. Also, numbers of owners are telling their tenants they will have to find another place if they want to farm as they will be unable to furnish them money on the small acreage given to their farm.

The people are looking to you, as their Congressman for relief of some kind in this cotton acreage allotment for 1950. We think something has got to be done, and at once to relieve the tight situation in regards to 1950 cotton allotments. We are looking to you to help correct whatever it takes to make things better for the cotton farmers in Upshur County.

If I, or this office can be of any further help, please advise.

Thanking you.

Very truly yours,

LEWIS E. STRACENER, Jr.,
Administration Officer,
Upshur County, PMA.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Yours of December 31, 1949, received. War crop credits given Upshur County farmers for 1946 was 3,426 acres and 1947 was 3,164 acres.

The mentioned "dead acreage" referred to, we estimate will yield about 1,500 acres if the ones holding the allotment will release it. And further, there are more people coming back to the farm than we first estimated, and our reserve of 250 acres for new farms is not sufficient to give anything like a substantial allotment.

It looks now like there will be about 200 new farms asking for some acreage; also, looks like we will need 2,000 acres to take care of war crop credit and new farms.

Very truly yours,

W. B. HOLLINSHEAD,
R. L. WHITE,
E. C. PALMER,

GILMER, TEX., October 27, 1949.

To: Hon. Charles F. Brannan, Secretary of of United States Department of Agriculture.

From: Upshur County PMA Committee.

Subject: Consideration of an increase in cotton acreage allotments for 1950 in east Texas area.

1. We would appreciate very much, when county cotton acreage allotments are set up, that special consideration be given this east Texas area, due to the fact, in war years most of the young men were drafted into the armed services, since they could not have the necessary 20 war units which were necessary for deferment, due to most farms being small.

2. Therefore, when these boys were drafted off the farms, most farms went out of cotton production, due to the overage of parents left to do farm work, being 60 or more years of age, not much cotton farming was done during these years, after their sons were taken into armed services. Now some of these farms are wanting cotton acreage.

3. In areas where farming operations were on a larger scale, like in west Texas, most boys had the 20 war units to get deferments.

4. We as a county committee would like to see that the farmers of this area get a fair share of the cotton acreage allotment. We feel that the figures given this county to adjust down to, was not a fair acreage. We think more acreages of cotton were actually grown in these years, than those supposed to have been given by BAE.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will acknowledge your letters of October 28 and November 5 with which you enclosed certain correspondence regarding the establishment of county cotton acreage allotments, especially in Upshur County.

Section 344 (c) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, including amendments made by Public Laws 272 and 439, Eighty-first Congress, reads as follows:

"SEC. 344. (c) The national acreage allotments for cotton for the years 1950 and 1951 shall be apportioned to the States on the basis of a national acreage allotment base of 22,500,000 acres, computed and adjusted as follows:

"(1) The average of the planted acreages (including acreage regarded as planted under the provisions of Public Law 12, 79th Cong.) in the States for the years 1945, 1946, 1947, and 1948 shall constitute the national base; except that in the case of any State having a 1948 planted cotton acreage of over 1,000,000 acres and less than 50 percent of the 1943 allotment, the average of the acreage planted (or regarded as planted under Public Law 12, 79th Cong.) for the years 1944, 1945, 1946, 1947, and 1948 shall constitute the base for such State and shall be included in computing the national base; to this is to be added (A) the estimated additional acreage for each State required for small farm allotments under subsection (f) (1) of this section; (B) the acreage required as a result of the State adjustment provisions of paragraph (2) of this subsection; (C) the additional acreage required to determine a total national allotment base of 22,500,000 acres, which additional acreage shall be distributed on a proportionate basis among States receiving no adjustment under paragraph (2) of this subsection.

"(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (1) of this subsection, the acreage allotment base for 1950 and 1951 for any State (on the basis of a national acreage allotment base of 22,500,000 acres) shall not be less than the larger of (1) 95 percent of the average acreage actually planted to cotton in the State during the years 1947 and 1948, or (2) 85 percent of the acreage planted to cotton in the State in 1948.

"(3) If the national acreage allotment for 1950 and 1951 is more or less than 22,500,000 acres, horizontal adjustments shall be made percentagewise by States so as to reflect the ratio of the national acreage allotment for 1950 and 1951 to 22,500,000 acres."

In applying the above formula for establishing State cotton acreage allotments, Texas received its share of the national allotment base of 22,500,000 acres on the basis of 95 percent of the average acreage actually planted to cotton in 1947 and 1948. On this basis it also received its share of the national allotment of 21,000,000 acres for 1950.

Section 344 (e) of the act provides that the State acreage allotment, less a reserve not to exceed 10 percent, shall be apportioned to counties on the same basis as to years and conditions that the State receives its allotment. Accordingly, the counties in Texas will receive their initial allotments based on 95 percent of the 1947–1948 average acreage actually planted to cotton in the county.

Therefore, under the provisions of sections 344 (c) (2) and 344 (e) of the Act, war crop and armed forces credits determined under Public Law 12, Seventy-ninth Congress, and Public Law 272, Eighty-first Congress, were not included in the cotton acreage history in determining the State and county allotments.

The State committee may use the State acreage reserve to adjust (1) for trends in acreage, (2) for counties adversely affected by abnormal conditions affecting plantings, and (3) for small or new farms.

In view of the fact that you have presented this matter to the Texas State PMA committee for their consideration we are sure they will give it proper consideration insofar as legislation and facts will support.

We regret that we cannot comply with your request for a representative of the Department to visit you in Texas at this time; however, the volume of work in the Cotton Branch in connection with allotments precludes it. Perhaps Mr. B. F. Vance, chairman, Texas State PMA committee could send someone to assist you if you so requested him.

Sincerely yours,
K. T. HUTCHINSON,
Assistant Secretary.

DEAR SIR: This is in regard to both of your letters, dated December 29, 1949, and December 30, 1949.

Wood County reserved 300 acres for both old cotton farms, which have not grown cotton in several years, and new farms.

Approximately 30 producers have let it be known that they are interested in securing a new grower allotment for 1950. We are unable to determine the exact number because a date will be set, I am sure, by the State PMA committee, at which time applications for new grower allotments will be filed.

We could not reserve any more than 300 acres for the above type of farms without hurting the old grower.

Hoping the above is the desired information, I am

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: With reference to your letter dated December 23, 1949, we hereby give the following information:

Our records show that the 1942 cotton allotment for Camp County was 16,307 acres compared to slightly over 6,900 acres for 1950.

If it was possible to distribute the unused 1950 alloted acres we feel that we could possibly distribute 1,500 acres. However, due to the disturbance among the cotton farmers as to the cotton history and other factors pertaining to cotton allotments, it is not possible to know how many would be willing to risk giving up their allotment or a part thereof for redistribution.

The acres we estimate that might be unused and redistributed would not come from any genuine cotton farmers in the county.

Our records show that Camp county as a whole has 1,491 acres of war crop credits of which we estimate 1,000 acres will be added to the county if credits given.

We estimate that approximately 75 genuine cotton farmers might be compelled to cease to farm under the 1950 allotment formula.

Very truly yours,
JAMES C. DAVIS,
Chairman, Camp County PMA.

DEAR SIR: With reference to your letter of January 3, 1950, we would like to give you the following acreage reserves for Gregg County, Tex. We have a total of 146 acres to be divided among the old cotton farms which have not been growing cotton recently and the new cotton growers. We believe that approximately 50 to 100 farmers in this classification will make an application for some of this acreage.

Third District,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This in in reply to your letters of December 23, 29, and 30, 1949 requesting information on the 1950 cotton allotment situation in Rusk County.

There was set up in this county a reserve of 1,349.7 acres to distribute the new growers. We now estimate that between nine hundred and one thousand farmers will request this acreage. The demand for farms with any kind of cotton allotment is enormous.

We estimate that there will be approximately two hundred farms with two or more tenants and only enough cotton allotment for one of them. Also, there probably will be over one hundred farms with one tenant, who will be forced to cease farming under the present 1950 allotment formula.

Texas probably has enough acres if it could be redistributed more equitably between counties and also within the county.

Trusting this information will be of use to you and with best wishes, we are,

Respectfully yours,

E. D. MANSINGER, Chairman,

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
United States Congressman, Third District, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in connection with any proposed legislation to correct inequalities of the 1950 cotton allotment procedure.

It has been proposed that allotments be figured on a basis of 70 percent of the average planted acres on a farm for 1946, 1947, and 1948. Since all counties were required to adjust the total planted acre history downward for these 3 years to the level set by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, the procedure adopted by most counties was to make a downward adjustment to an individual farm on only 2 years out of the 3 basic years. In that way the farm would receive an allotment of either the highest planted year or the county factor, whichever the smaller, and would not be penalized by any arbitrary adjustment by the county committee. In many instances a drastic adjustment was made in the reported acreage on a farm for 1 or 2 years, while leaving the high year as it was reported.

Now the point we wish to make is that any average of these 3 years, as adjusted, is not the average farm history and in most cases would lower the present allotment to a farm. Furthermore, the farmers were advised by us that any arbitrary adjustment (of which he was advised) in only one or two of the base years would not effect any cotton allotment he might receive. Any amendment to the law based on the above procedure would not afford any relief to this county, would be difficult to administer and would cause a real hardship to many producers as well as this county committee.

It is our opinion that the war crop credit for a county should be added to the cotton history for those years. Under the present system of allocation to the counties, it would give us about 2,000 acres additional allotment. That increase, together with a flexible system of recalling "frozen" acres on farms going out of the cotton business, would enable us to set up reasonable allotments to all cotton farms.

Respectfully yours,

E. D. MANSINGER,
Rusk County PMA Committee.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: The Camp County PMA committee reserved 100 acres from the county acreage allotment which are available to distribute to new cotton farms in the county. About 45 cotton farmers have requested this acreage for 36 farms through owners and operators.

Regarding your letter of December 30, 1949, in which you quoted a letter in part from Mr. B. F. Vance, State director, PMA, College Station, the county committee has received a portion of the total county allotment for use in establishing 1950 allotments for those farms that were not eligible for regular allotments as stated in Mr. Vance's letter; however, this reserve, according to our understanding, is only for the new-grower farms—the 100 acres mentioned.

The committee has reserved 72 acres to be used on late reported and reconstituted farms. There is no reserve for any farm other than the ones mentioned above since a farm would either come under the category of a regular, late, or reconstituted, or a new grower which had planted no cotton in the base years 1946, 1947, and 1948.

About 50 farmers have requested additional acres on the 42 regular cotton farms.

If we can be of any further assistance, please call on us.

Very truly yours,

ELBERT O. DISMAN,
Secretary, Camp County PMA.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: I would like to reply to your letter of December 23, 1949, on cotton allotments with answers to each question in sequence.

The 1942 Harrison County allotment was 75,000 acres. We believe if we could distribute the unused 1950 allotment we would have 1,500 to 2,000 acres to distribute.

If we can allot unused acres not many genuine cotton farmers would have to abandon farming although some larger farms might drop some tenants before their allotments are corrected.

War crop credits in this county amounted to approximately 2,000 acres.

Under the 1950 allotment formula up to 300 and 400 farmers will be forced to cease farming as their acreage is too small to obtain credit.

The Negro farmers with large families on farms with 20 to 50 acres of cropland are the hardest hit by this method of calculating allotments.

Yours very truly,

WALCOTT S. BLACK,
Administrative Officer,
Harrison County PMA.

MARSHALL NEWS MESSENGER,
Marshall, Tex., January 4, 1950.

The Honorable LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: We have made a study of the cotton-acreage situation in Harrison County, in answer to your query, and find these answers:

(a) County allotment in 1942, 75,000 acres.

(b) Additional acres for distribution, 2,000 the first week, and upward from there, according to the county PMA supervisor.

(c) Of this amount, how many from genuine cotton farmers no longer able to operate, a sizable fraction, but no guess possible as yet.

(d) War-crop credit about 2,000 acres. However, the PMA supervisor feels this was included in the county's quota of 24,839 acres.

(e) How many farmers may be compelled to cease farming—an estimated 300 to 400 families.

I hope this gives you the requested information.

Sincerely,

MAX S. LALE.

Mr. Speaker, I enclose at this point a news item which appeared in the Marshall News Messenger, January 4, 1950:

PMA OFFICIAL SAYS HUNDREDS OF FAMILIES TO BE DRIVEN OFF THE LAND BY COTTON ALLOTMENTS

(By Max S. Lale)

A minor revolution is in the making for Harrison County's whole farm economy.

Its outlines are being sketched in by disgruntled cotton farmers keeping up a steady traffic into the offices of the Production and Marketing Administration.

This minor revolution is a creature of the Federal Government's new cotton allotment scheme which Harrison County farmers approved, in company with cotton growers in other parts of the country, by decisive margins last month.

One of the most serious consequences of the scheme is that as many as 400 families, and possibly more, may be driven from the land.

It is not taking place, however, without vigorous protest.

For 3 weeks, a steady stream of cotton farmers, most of them Negroes and almost all of them tenants, has eddied into the PMA office, protesting reduced acreage allotments.

The new cotton scheme sets county acreage totals. The total for Harrison County is 24,839, a reduction of approximately 5,000 acres from the 1949 planting.

The difficulty is in the scheme's application to individual farms. It comes about because of the way in which the acreage allowable is determined.

ACREAGE PLAN

The Department of Agriculture says that the acreage shall be 16.27 percent of the crop land in the farm, or the highest number of acres planted to cotton in any one of the years 1946, 1947, or 1948, whichever is the smaller.

On large farms, where there has been steadily high acreage planted to cotton, the allotment is working out satisfactorily. It's the small tracts, where plantings have been small during the three base years, which are giving the trouble. Take this case:

A Negro family has been living on a tract of family size.. The husband has been working part time at a sawmill, and one or more of the sons has been working in town or going to school under th GI bill. The family worked a few acres of cotton, more out of tradition than as a means of making the family living.

Now, the GI school money is about exhausted, something happens to one of the jobs. The family decides cotton is the answer. But there isn't enough acreage to make a living.

Multiply this by four or five, as in the case of large farms occupied by a number of tenant families. Their owners are telling the PMA that there just won't be enough acreage to support all the families. Some of them will have to go.

SMALL TRACTS

Another difficulty is trying to consolidate small tracts with reduced acreage into a feasible operation for one tenant family. A few acres here, a few more there—whether a family can be secured to work the tracts is the problem.

These are some of the situations which W. S. Black, PMA supervisor in the county, says will force three or four hundred families off the land.

The result of such a migration will be felt in every part of the country's life. It will mean reduced farm values. It will mean reduced taxes. It will mean less farm production and less money in trade channels. And it will mean, in all probability, an increased charity burden.

As a result of fragmentary allocations which will be wasted by not being planted, the county's total acreage probably will be well below the figure set for the county.

CAN'T REDISTRIBUTE

PMA officials had hoped that they would be allowed to redistribute unused acreage. But that has been ruled out, at least for the time being.

The PMA supervisor says he could find 2,000 acres in a week, if they'd let him. "The figure goes from there on up," he adds.

And what if a disgruntled farmer decides he doesn't want any part of the scheme?

First off, the county committee will set a penalty average of lint production, and the farmer will be charged this penalty average on all cotton raised in excess of authorized allotments. He must pay this fine, in cash, or it becomes a first lien on his entire crop.

Furthermore, even with payment of the penalty, he is ineligible for support payments, and must sell his entire production on the open market. He can't even do this unless he pays his fine, for the ginner will require PMA certificates before he gins the cotton.

The whole system is virtually escape-proof. For many families caught in sharply restricted acreage allotments, it means economic eviction from their homes.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: We have your letter of December 23, 1949, related to cotton allotments in Trinity County.

The 1942 cotton allotment was 15,062.7 acres. Of this amount 8,995 was planted on 1,104 farms.

If we could distribute unused acres this would not help much, because tenants from other farms are trying to rent surplus cotton acres on all farms. Landlords and operators would not release many acres because of the possible effect on future allotments. We have 175 acres to be used on farms that have no allotments and have had at least 325 applications for these acres. Most of these applicants are producers that shifted during the war to other crops and livestock. If something is not done at least 20 or 30 veterans will have to leave the farm along with others. Some of these boys bought tractors and farms and started in the spring of 1949.

If we received war-crop credits an additional 853 acres would be given to our county.

In 1942 we had 1,400 farms growing cotton as compared to 516 farms receiving allotments under the new law. You can see from these figures what the cotton situation is in our county.

We hope something can be done. If farmers lose their buying power we are right back where we were after the First World War. We hope you might be able to help change the present allotment laws.

Please call on us any time this office can be of help to you.

Very truly yours,

SIR: In answer to your questionnaire of December 23, 1949, the following information can be furnished:

The official cotton allotment for Sabine County was 2,920 acres.

Final allotment was 3,272.7 acres.

If we could distribute the unused 1950 allotment in this county we would gain approximately 100 acres. Very little of this would come from genuine cotton farmers who could not continue to farm because of small allotments, but from small farms being taken out of cultivation.

The type of war-crop credits being talked about would probably help this county very little.

Probably 12 families may be compelled to cease cotton farming because of allotments. Most of these will be tenants.

What this county needs is additional acreage for establishing allotments on new farms having operators who have been released from wartime jobs and having no other ready means of livelihood. We have only 115.3 acres for the purpose, and approximately 200 farmers have requested this acreage on that many farms.

There are also many GI's who were not operators of farms when called into service because they were still unmarried boys with no family responsibilities.

These boys were able to purchase farms in 1948 and 1949 and are now able to cultivate them.

Because of acreage history they can get no cotton, except new allotments. Can they be helped?

Thanks for your interest.

Yours truly,
HARRIS H. MINTON,

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BECKWORTH: In reply to your inquiry of December 23, 1949, relating to 195 cotton acreage allotments, we submit the following:

The 1942 cotton acreage allotment for Anderson County was 46,182.3.

We estimate the unused acreage allotment at 1,000 acres that could be released and would be released for redistribution provided history be retained so as not to affect future allotments of the farm releasing same. We estimate that none of this released acreage will come from genuine cotton farmers.

The genuine cotton farmer regardless of his allotment will prefer to retain it, large or small.

We estimate the number of tenants in our county displaced on account of the small-acreage formula at 400. We feel our farmers cannot complain about war-crop credits. The individual farms got credit, but our county did not. Our county had allotted 12,630 acres for 1950 cotton. This amount included war-crop credits.

We estimate approximately 5,000 of this acreage was allotted to peanut growers and came off the regular cotton growers acreage. This 12,630 acres had to be allotted to 121,446 acres of cropland. This of course caused the county to get a low factor. Our factor is .0955.

It all sums up to this: the allotment was based on the BAE estimated acres 1946, 1947, and 1948. Since the war began and on through this period our farmers grew peas, melons, tomatoes, and other crops instead of cotton.

We want to assure you we appreciate your interest and assure you if we can be of further assistance we will expect you to call on us.

We are sending a copy of this to our Congressman, TOM PICKETT.

DEAR SIR: The cotton acreage allotment to Walker County in 1942 was 20,604 acres. For 1950, 7,023 acres. If we could distribute the unused 1950 allotment, we would have approximately 300 acres. None of this unused acreage will come from genuine cotton farmers but will come from cattlemen who have rented, leased, or purchased farms which were eligible for allotments. Since the allotments are made to the farm and not to the individual, there are many landlords who will have to let their tenants go because the allotments are not large enough to support all, and cotton is the only cash crop in our county. There will be approximately 150 tenants compelled to leave the farms because of too little acreage. Our allotments were based on 15 percent of the cropland, limited by the highest planted in 1946, 1947, or 1948. This is about half of what the average cotton grower would plant to cotton, under normal conditions.

We have 600 acres available to new cotton farms in Walker County and applications from 400 farms requesting an allotment.

Thanking you for your interest, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress, Third District, Texas,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR HON. LINDLEY BECKWORTH: This is with reference to your letter of inquiry, date of December 12, 1949, on the cotton situation in Trinity County. We have 175 acres of cotton to be distributed to new grower cotton farms. To date there has been at least 320 applicants for this acreage. The applicants for the acreage are from farmers who shifted during the war to other crops, and GI's returning from the war. A few of the applicants, approximately six or eight, are people who have been working in defense industry, but have returned to the farm because they are too old and are being laid off from work, due to their age.

Several applicants are tenants from the farm having allotments so low the landlord will work the entire crop of cotton: example, tenant owning 80 acres of land, approximately 45 acres in cultivation, has worked peanuts (for market) and cotton on the adjoining farms for the years 1946, 1947, 1948, and feed crops on his own farm. Under the present law the tenant is a new grower and the landlord has a small allotment, which necessitates the tenant requesting new grower allotment.

To clarify the situation in this county, we would like to point out that in 1942, 1,400 farms were growing cotton, compared to 516 allotment farms in 1950. You can imagine the number of requests this office will have for new grower allotments.

May I make a personal observation and state that we are 12 months behind on cotton. Everyone realizes there is a surplus of cotton, due to bumper crops in 1949, thereby necessitating a reduction in acreage. However, if we, or the farmers, have to accept a drastic reduction, the buying power of the farmer will be reduced so much that industry, labor, etc., will be affected to such an extent as to drive our country back to a depression.

In a recent meeting with the local merchants in our small town, everyone, without an exception, has already felt the effects of this program. The farmers are holding their money and doing without everything except the absolute necessities.

I wish that you, as well as Mr. PICKETT and the others, could be in our office and get the reaction of the farmers that visit this office. Then you would have a clearer picture of the whole situation. The farmers are not as critical as you would expect, but are disturbed.

It is hard for us to write the story as it actually is in our county, but hope this will help you in your fight for better farm programs. Please call upon us for any information you need and we shall work day and night to supply you with the information.

FRANK N. CATES,

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: The 1942 cotton allotment for Henderson County is 50,000 acres. We do not think producers of this county would release acreage in time to redistribute for 1950.

Henderson County's allotment will only support one tenant per farm. Some farms will reduce their tenants as much as 10. For example in east part of county three tenants on one farm have 7-acre allotment. Ninety percent of our cropland will have to be planted to some other crops than cotton.

1946 war credits: 4,530 acres on 649 farms.
1947 war credits: 4,277 acres on 646 farms.

Three hundred and thirty-four acres are available to distribute to new growers. Approximately 1,000 producers are requesting this acreage.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BECKWORTH: In reply to your letter of January 3, 1950, in which you quote a portion of Mr. B. F. Vance's letter in regard to a reserve set aside by the county committee for adjustment purposes, I wish to advise.

In answer to the first question as to how many acres the county committee reserved for old farms which have not been growing cotton recently, and the second question, "How many new farms", we wish to say that new farms and old cotton farms, as well, are put under one classification as "new grower" farms. These farms are eligible to apply for a "new grower" cotton allotment. The county committee set aside 1,041 acres as a reserve for "new grower" cotton allotments. We have in Shelby County 2,242 farms which come under the above classification. It is estimated that approximately 50 percent of these farms will apply for a new grower allotment.

We hope that this information will clarify these questions for you.

DEAR SIR: The allotment for San Jacinto County in 1942 was approximately 6,500 acres.

I have been unable to find anyone that will release any acreage for redistribution in the county.

From a canvass of the county, if farms with two tenants and up do not get additional acreage, at least 40 percent of tenants will be released.

The war-crop credits for 1946 were 718 acres and for 1947 were 466 acres. If we could get additional cotton acreage according to our war-crop credits, I think that everyone will have enough acreage to get by with, but if we do not get additional acreage, I estimate that at least 100 farm families that raised cotton in 1949 will be left without any cotton acreage and nothing else to do. The pulpwood and sawmill work is just about over in this county and you know that they cannot move to town.

I hope this information will be a help to you in getting something done about the acreage allotments.

SIR: This is in reply to your letters of December 23 and 29 in which you requested information concerning cotton allotments in Hopkins County.

The 1942 cotton allotment for this county was approximately 62 to 68 thousand acres.

We feel that if the unused 1950 allotment were redistributed there would be around 1,000 acres for redistribution, but none of this would come from genuine cotton farmers.

If we are given war-crop credits, it will probably mean about 900 acres for this county. It is possible that we might lose 25 cotton farmers, including tenants, under the 1950 allotment formula.

There have been 75 farmers in to ask about the 400 acres which we have available for new farms in this county.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: Reference is made to your letter of December 29, 1949, in regard to new grower cotton acreage under the 1950 PMA cotton program.

Our county committee set up 810 acres for new growers.

It is anticipated that some 60 new growers, including veterans, will take up this acreage which will average thirteen and five-tenths acres per farm.

We are hoping Congress will give some relief to farmers in regard to "frozen" acres, also to farmers who were severely reduced below 50 percent of their cropland for cotton.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR LINDLEY: I know that you are a busy man and for that reason I have made it a point not to bother you during your stay in Washington, but there is a matter of great importance facing all east Texans that I want to discuss with you briefly.

East Texas has never been looked on as a cotton-producing area, and as a result our interest is not considered when it comes to formulating cotton-control programs. On the other hand cotton has and still is one of the means of providing the requirements of life for those living on farms here in Panola County. Farmers are now faced with a grave problem if the cotton-control program which is now being considered goes into effect.

One reason we are having a control program is because we have a surplus of cotton, but the little 3-to-10-bale farmer of this county had nothing to do with the surplus we now have. It has been brought about by the 100-to-1,000-bale farmer, and, if I understand the program, he will not be affected as will the little man here. My idea about any program that has to do with the national economy should be a fair and just one for all those who participate in it.

Prewar, we had farmers in Panola, and it is the same all over east Texas, who worked small farms and most of their farm income was from small cotton acreage. During the war they left the farms to go into the shipyards and war plants because they could make more money. All this is past history now, and they have returned to the farm to find out that because they did not work large cotton acreage during the past few years that they are not qualified to work the same acreage as before. In some cases I have talked to farmers who state that they would like to farm but that it takes money to farm and that the proposed farm-control program as now explained to them would not permit the planting of a cash crop to assure them a living.

I understand that we are to have only about 21,000,000 acres to be planted in cotton next year. Why not find out what percent this is of the total tilled acreage and if it is 20 or 30 percent then allow each farm that amount of cotton. In many cases it would not be planted as all farmers do not want cotton and if they did not then we would have just that much less to worry us next year. Give all an equal chance and leave it up to the individual to decide if he wants cotton or not. If the farmers the country over raised as little cotton as do the farmers of Panola County then we would not be faced with cotton-control programs. Even at that they should be allowed to have their just share.

Not only has it affected the farmer but the merchant as well. His business is suffering now and will suffer more next fall if farmers do not have some type of cash crop. Any time you cut the farmers' income off you cut off the merchants because farmers have always spent what they have made, but if they do not have it then they cannot spend it. This would be a sure way of bringing about a recession or depression. To have a better condition I think the income from cotton should be spread out and not confined to a select few. These farmers who have by overplanting during the past few years brought about a surplus of cotton have made more money than at any time before so why should not they be penalized like the man who did not plant at all or but little?

I may be talking through my nose but this matter has to do with the future welfare of all farmers of this any many other counties of east Texas and in my way of thinking should come in for its just share of consideration. Personally I do not intend to plant 1 acre of cotton but I have about 500 acres of farmland and if I did want to plant some cotton I should be given that right. It so happens that I have not had any cotton on my farm for the past few years and I am told that I could not plant any cotton if I wanted to.

I could say much more but the more I say the less likely it will be read so I will call it a day by saying that you have always taken problems of east Texas to heart and I am sure you will be in there punching on this matter. Seriously, though, LINDLEY, this is more than a laughing matter and just this week we are carrying out a program of democracy beats communism but the farmers cannot wholeheartedly take part in it when they are being discriminated against as they are in this cotton-control program.

Thanking you for any and all consideration you may see fit to give the above, I beg to remain,

Sincerely yours,

FORREST E. ROBERTS.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I entered the armed service in December 1943—Thirtieth Division, Infantry—came out in September 1945. As an aid man I saw many men pay the supreme price for freedom. I entered as a farmer and came out as one according to my discharge papers, and I have grown cotton as my chief money crop all my life.

Following my discharge I took my $300 mustering-out pay and began farming again.

Living close and saving every penny I paid a first payment on my 69-acre farm in 1948 and planted 30 acres of cotton and made 20 bales of cotton in 1949.

Now since there was no cotton planted on this farm in 1947 or 1948 the AAA tells me there will be no cotton acreage allotted to my farm at all.

Do you think that is right for the ex-servicemen to be left out of the farm program or should he share equal rights with the men who were not in the service?

Would like to hear from you as to how you voted on this farm bill.

Yours truly,

J. R. HANSON.

Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Texas Representative,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you in regards of the cotton allotment (acreage). I am a farmer with six other working hands on the farm, and my cotton-acreage allotment has been cut to 5 acres on one of the farms that I have rented. The other farm that we are to work has not been worked in several years. I understand that no acreage allotment will be given for this farm. So I am writing you to see what can be done in my case. I am a renter without a farm of my own and I have to work land where I can get it. I was unable to rent the land I worked last year because the landlord is farming himself. Therefore I had to rent another farm but if no cotton allotment is given on that farm I do not see how I will be able to support my family with only 5 acres of cotton.

I hope you will be able to change this allotment.

Yours truly,

MONROE ARNOLD.

MINEOLA, TEX., January 2, 1950.

Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH.

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: I'm writing you in regard about my cotton allotment. I was given only 15 acres for my quota. I have 175 acres in cultivation and I have three share croppers. So you see this would give them five acres each. They can't get by with this and live and neither can I. If I can't get more than this I guess my renters will have to quit farming and go to public jobs or the Government will have to help them some way. If I can get 35 acres my renters can get by.

My son has two farms adjoining me and they didn't give him any at all and he has the land rented. I just don't know what his renter will do.

I just don't approve of this kind of business. Anything you can do to help my son and me will be appreciated. Hope we can get a few more acreages. If I can't, just well let the farm lay out.

You know east Texas farmers can't cultivate as much as west Texas, so therefore this will surely hurt them. I'm in hope you may be able to help us. So wishing you a Happy New Year.

Always your friend.

R. G. MACLIN.

P. S.—Hoyt and family joins in best regards to you and yours.

LONGSTREET, LA., January 2, 1950.

MY DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: I am writing you on behalf of my mother and other cotton farmers of Panola County whose cotton acreage has been cut entirely too low for the county. Most of the farmers depend on their cotton crop for their spending money. This cut will work quite a hardship on them. Some may have to hunt work elsewhere, especially the tenant farmer. Panola County had a fair cotton crop this past year, but as you probably know, this county, as other east Texas counties, were quite hard hit for several years prior to 1949 by the drought and cotton pests. They haven't recovered yet from their losses and now comes this decrease in acreage.

Something should be done about this if it is humanly possible, and I do believe it is. The small cotton farmer suffers most, you see.

In another way these farmers are hurt is this: They have bought tractors and other farming implements. Now they will have to sell them at a great loss for they can't possibly pay for them with this cut in their cotton acreage. This certainly isn't fair.

I don't believe the cotton committee fully understands the true condition that exists among the small cotton farmers. If they don't, they should get busy immediately and familiarize themselves with the true conditions and then try to give aid where it is so badly needed.

Many of these borrow money to make their crop, and with these cuts the banks aren't going to loan money with no chance of getting it. Another hardship, you see.

Mr. BECKWORTH, use your influence in trying to get some relief for the small farmer if you possibly can. I feel sure you will do your best for them.

Thanking you, I remain,

Very sincerely,

(Miss) CORA JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 6, 1950.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF THE CENSUS,
Washington, November 30, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your letter of November 20, 1949.

Except for landlords all of the five groups of farmers mentioned are considered as farm operators by the census. Therefore a count of census farms which report cotton provides a count of farmers producing cotton with the exception mentioned.

Special tabulations based on a sample of the farms enumerated in the 1945 Census of Agriculture provide a classification of farms reporting cotton by tenure of the farm operator, as follows:

Farms in United States reporting cotton, 1944

All farms	1,201,438
Full owners	395,608
Part owners	79,412
Managers	3,743
All tenants	722,675
Cash tenants	105,024
Share-cash tenants	16,292
Share tenants	229,499
Croppers (South only)	313,800
Other and unspecified	58,060

No information on the number of landlords who produce cotton with the assistance of share tenants or croppers is available from the 1945 census.

The 1950 census will provide a classification of farms similar to that of 1945. Note that in this classification owner-operators who rent additional land from others (part owners) are shown separately from those who own all the land they operate (full owners). Managed farms are also shown separately. Cash tenants, share tenants, and croppers are each shown as a separate group. Tenants paying both cash and a share make up an additional group (share-cash tenants). The 1945 questionnaire called for reporting "cash," "share," "share-cash," and "other" methods of rental only. Presumably standing-rent or fixed-rent tenants are included with "other" tenants. In 1950 standing rent or fixed rent is grouped on the questionnaire with other miscellaneous rental arrangements. The rental arrangements included in this group are "A fixed quantity of any product, upkeep of land and buildings, payment of taxes, keep of landlord, rent free, etc." Hence, standing-rent or fixed-rent tenants cannot be shown as a separate group in 1950, but will be included with "other" tenants.

Tentative plans call for a tabulation similar to that for 1945 which will show for the 1950 census, farms reporting cotton classified by tenure of the farm operator.

A special questionnaire, the Landlord-Tenant Operations Questionnaire, which will be used in most of the cotton areas, will obtain information for a part of the landlord group. This questionnaire is required, in the designated areas, for each landlord who retains some land himself and has one or more tenants or croppers, also for landlords who retain no land themselves and have two or more tenants or croppers. The first group of landlords, of course, will be counted with the owner-operator group. The second group of landlords would not be included in the census count of farm operators. The Landlord-Tenant Operations Questionnaire should make it possible to obtain a count of that portion of this second group of landlords who grow cotton with the assistance of share tenants or croppers. A third group of landlords will not require Landlord-Tenant Operations Questionnaires. These are landlords who have all their land rented to or worked by one tenant or cropper. A rough estimate of the number of landlords in this group who grow cotton with the help of share tenants and croppers might be obtained by subtracting from the total number of share tenants, croppers, and share-cash tenants who report cotton those listed on the Landlord-Tenant Operations Questionnaires. This estimate would not take into account a number of considerations, including the fact that some tenants will have two or more landlords.

Please let us know if we can be of any further assistance.

In accordance with your request we are returning the letter of the Under Secretary of Agriculture which was enclosed with your letter.

Sincerely yours,

PHILIP M. HAUSER,
Acting Director, Bureau of the Census.

Mr. Speaker, according to some figures I have taken from records of the Department of Agriculture and from the 1949 Texas Almanac, a publication of the Dallas Mornings News, some very interesting county cotton acreage comparisons exist in Texas. In 1942 the cotton acreage allotment of some 14 east Texas counties I refer to was 720,501; the 1950 cotton acreage allotment of the same 14 counties is 225,953 acres—less than one-third of the number of acres they had in 1942. The 1940 total population of the 14 counties was 494,004. They have more people now, I would estimate. The 1949 Texas Almanac shows the 14 east Texas counties to have some 43,127 farms.

I think it can be shown, on the other hand, there are counties in Texas individually having in them considerably less than 100,000 people and individually less than 2,500 farms that have more allotted cotton acreage than all the 14 counties with their over 40,000 farms and almost one-half million people—whereas the latter counties referred to individually had less than one-fourth of the cotton acreage then allotted the 14 counties in 1942.

At this point I desire to include a table which I feel is reasonably accurate based on the sources referred to:

Some cotton allotment comparisons

County	1950 cotton allotment (acres)	1942 cotton allotment (acres)	Population, 1940	Number of farms
Wood	10,404	42,003	24,360	2,431

Magnolia, Ark., January 6, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The information requested in your letter of December 24 is listed below:

1942 cotton allotment: 53,783.5 acres.

1950 cotton allotment: 22,579 acres.

Estimated number of acres that would be released for reapportionment if a provision was made by law: 200 acres.

Estimated acreage which will come from genuine cotton farmers who cannot continue to farm because of too little acreage: None.

Estimated number of cotton farmers in the county who might be compelled to cease to farm under the 1950 allotment formula: 400.

Arkansas as well as Columbia County received its allotment based upon 95 percent of the 1947 and 1948 average planted acreage with adjustment for war-crop credits.

The county committee set aside 700 acres for new allotment farms in 1950. This will include farms which did not plant cotton during the period 1946, 1947, and 1948 and farms which planted cotton in 1949 and 1950 for the first time. Most of the farms in this county are small-type farms. About 90 percent of the total farms have allotments of 15 acres or less.

Yours very truly,

COLUMBIA COUNTY PMA COMMITTEE,
J. C. GUNNELS, Chairman.

Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Congress of the United States, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: In reply to your letter concerning cotton acreage, we do not have any cotton to distribute to old farms that have not grown cotton recently. We have 250 acres to distribute to new farms. In 1942 the allotment for this county was approximately 18,000 acres. If we could distribute the unused 1950 allotment we feel that we could distribute 300 acres. We feel that the war-crop credit, that you mentioned in your letter, would not affect us in any appreciable way. We do not know how many, if any, cotton farmers will be unable to continue farming, however, at this point we would like to say that sharecroppers on a number of farms in the county will be dismissed and have to move onto other farms or else be unable to continue farming but that the landlord will go ahead and use the acreage allotted to his farm.

Yours very truly,

WELDON B. ABBOTT,
County Administrative Officer,
Ouachita County.

DEAR SIR: We are submitting herein the information requested in your letter of December 24, 1949:

1. The 1942 cotton allotment (Howard County), 15,890 acres.[1]

2. We feel that there will be 1,000 acres allotted to farms that will not be used. If the farmer would release this acreage it would take care of our situation—but, as past experience shows, farmers do not release their unused acreage.

[1] 1950 allotted acreage for Howard County, 7,236.

3. There will be no genuine cotton farmers who will have unused acreage.

4. The war-crop credits do not seem to be a point of contention here—the credits given under Public Law 12 seem to be satisfactory. War-crop credits are one of the factors detrimental to proper distribution of cotton acreage in this county. Some farms going out of cotton production, such as stock farming and fruit growing, obtained acreages not needed. This acreage will not be released in a lot of cases.

5. The number of farmers being out of a home on account of the reduction of cotton acreage in the county will be confined to tenants and sharecroppers, and the number "100" is only an estimate but considered conservative.

6. (a) We have 100.2 acres to distribute to old farms which have not grown cotton recently and (b) 222 acres for new farms.

Very truly yours,

ARTHUR R. JOHNSON,
County Administrative Officer.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The cotton acreage allotment for Clark County, Ark., in 1942 was 21,000 acres. The allotment for 1950 is 11,198 acres.

I estimate that if farmers could turn back cotton acreage that will not be planted in 1950 and be assured that the allotment would be returned to that farmer for 1951 there would be 700 acres released for reapportionment.

None of the genuine cotton farmers will turn back present acreage allotments.

If this county received total war-crop credit it would increase the county allotment approximately 1,300 acres. No cotton farmers who are owners will be forced to cease farming because of the 1950 allotment formula, but I would estimate that 100 tenant farmers will be forced out of cotton production under the present farm acreage allotment.

The committee reserved 125 acres for distribution to farmers which have not grown cotton recently and new farms.

Release of frozen acreage on farms which will not plant cotton in 1950 will result in satisfactory allotments on most farms.

Farmers with allotments which will not be planted in 1950 will release this acreage if they are assured that the allotment will be returned to their farm in 1951.

Yours very truly,

J. K. GALBRAITH,
Secretary to County PMA Committee,
Clark County, Ark.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: This is with reference to your letter requesting information about cotton allotments for Union County, Ark. The cotton allotment for Union County in 1942 was approximately 21,000 acres. The allotment we received for 1950 for the county is 6,042 acres.

I estimate that we would pick up approximately 400 acres if we could pick up the unused 1950 acres. Cotton allotments are averaging approximately 50 percent of the allotments established on the individual farms in 1942. In 1942 the county factor was 27 percent. Our factor for 1950 is 11.58.

We have 22 acres in the county reserve to use for new growers' allotments. In 1949 we had 150 farms planting 1,296 acres of cotton. As you know, these farms, plus all other farms requesting new growers' allotments, must be established out of reserve established for new growers.

If there is any additional information you desire, I will be pleased to furnish it to you.

Yours very truly,

CLINTON E. HENSON,
County Administrative Officer.

MURFREESBORO, ARK., January 4, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: Pike County is not a genuine cotton county as is no doubt the area which you represent. Few renters are in this county. Each owner cultivates his own small farm but the allotment for more than one-half of the farms is less than 5 acres.

The allotment for 1942 was 6,750 acres. The additional acreage with the distribution of the unused 1950 allotment could be well 500.

No genuine cotton farmer will pool his allotment but will cut his renters from 5 to 2 or 4 to 2.

The war-crop credit would not help this county very much.

There will be at least 200 farmers compelled to quit farming because of the 1950-allotment formula.

To old farms without allotment and "new farm," I have 50 acres. I have 200 requests for cotton allotments. This would mean at least 600 acres.

Thanking you for your interest and wishing you the best of success in your untiring efforts, I remain,

Yours very truly,

REEDER DILDY,
County Administrative Officer.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: In reply to your inquiry dated December 24, 1949 pertaining to cotton acreages, we are attempting to give you the best information we can as follows:

1. Our 1942 cotton allotment was about 50,000 acres.

2. I do not feel that there would be many unused acres to distribute. It would be much better to estimate the unused acreage and issue an additional acreage to be distributed for the following reasons:

(a) If a farmer thought he would have to give up his acreage he would try to plant same although he could not half work it.

(b) Most farmers would release their acreage too late to do anyone any good.

(c) There would be a chance that a cotton acreage blackmarket would result.

3. Most farmers will work their cotton regardless of how small their acreage.

4. The war crop credits as talked about now would help us very little as a whole, as I see it.

5. There will probably be four or five hundred families who will have to cease farming in our county on account of allotments.

6. We have not received instructions on old cotton farms which have not grown cotton lately.

7. We have 450 acres for new farms.

Very truly yours,

M. L. ENGLISH,
County Administrative Officer.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your request of December 24, 1949, I wish to give the following report for Clay County, Miss.: The cotton acreage allotment for Clay County in 1942 was 18,632 acres. Our 1950 allotment is 14,420 acres. We feel that if we could distribute the unused 1950 allotment that we would have 100 acres or more to distribute—the acreage released by farmers who do not intend to plant.

A minimum number of acres will be available for distribution as a result of war crop credits being talked about. It will give our county no more acres. It is estimated that 60 tenant farmers might be compelled to move away from the farm as the result of 1950 allotment formula.

Our county has 375 acres to distribute to old cotton farms who have not grown cotton recently. There is 150 acres available for distribution to new farms.

MR. BECKWORTH: Reference is made to your letter dated December 24, 1949, in regard to some information you need concerning the cotton allotment. This information is as follows:

1. The allotment for Smith County in 1942: Approximately 23,000 acres.

2. Additional unused 1950 allotment that could be distributed: 700 acres.

3. Of this unused acreage, this amount will come from genuine cotton farmers who cannot continue to farm because of too little acreage: 200.

4. Number of war-crop credits which is being talked about which will mean more acres to Smith County: 100 acres.

5. Number of genuine cotton farmers in Smith County that might be compelled to cease to farm in Smith County under the 1950-allotment formula: 200.

6. Number of acres to be distributed to farms which have not grown cotton recently including new farms: 350.

Natchitoches, La., January 4, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: In reply to your letter of December 24, this is to advise that the 1942 cotton-acreage allotment for Natchitoches Parish, La., was 50,233.7 acres.

If we could distribute the unused 1950 allotments to other farms within the parish, I believe that we could pick up between 2,500 to 3,000 acres. I do not think that any of this acreage will come from genuine cotton farmers who cannot continue to farm because of the reduced acreage.

I am not familiar with the type of war-crop credit that is being talked about; therefore I cannot answer this question.

There may be about 300 farm families in Natchitoches Parish displaced because of reduction of acreage.

As to the acreage to be distributed to old farms which have not grown cotton recently and to new farms which have recently come into production, we do not have any acreage in the parish for this purpose.

I understand that there are 35,000 acres set aside at the State level to take care of new-grower allotments.

We believe that if we can pick up unused acreage and distribute it to farms where additional cotton acreage is needed, many of our problems will be solved. Cotton-acreage allotments have been computed for quite a few farms where no cotton at all will be planted in 1950.

If you are in need of any additional information on this subject or any other phase of the PMA program at the parish level, please feel free to call upon me at any time.

Yours very truly,

H. L. SISSON,
Parish Administrative Officer.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: Reference is made to your memorandum of December 24, 1949, regarding 1950 cotton acreage allotments:

1. In 1942 the cotton acreage allotment in Grant Parish was 10,179.9 acres.

2. If the committees could distribute the acreage allotment that will not be used in 1950, it is estimated that it would amount to 60 acres. (This is taking for granted that the acreage release would remain in the parish and not be returned and distributed from the State level.)

3. None of the 60 acres would be returned from genuine cotton farms because of too small an acreage to justify farming. The farmers intend to plant even the smallest allotments, even though it would be too small to sustain them, and subsidize their income from public work if available.

4. The 60 acres that would be returned will be from farms on which allotments were issued on which no cotton will be planted in 1950 (i. e. farms planting cotton one or more years 1946, 1947, or 1948, or having war crop credit and had not planted cotton since 1941).

5. I am at a loss to make an estimate on the "war crop credit which is being talked about" sentence in your memorandum, as it is not clear just how it would work out in this parish.

6. It is the estimate of the parish committee and myself that at least 72 farm families will be compelled to cease farming operations in this parish during 1950 due to 1950 cotton acreage allotments.

Our 1950 cotton acreage allotment is 5,917.8 acres.

Hoping this is the information you desired, I am,

Yours very truly,

VICTOR A. ADAMS,
Parish Administrative Officer.

The Honorable LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
United States Representative,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: This is in answer to your letter of December 24, 1949.

As you may know the questions referred to in your letter are very difficult to answer in view of the fact that most of these questions can only be answered in the form of estimates.

Members of the Claiborne Parish committee were contacted and the following information is given:

1. The Claiborne Parish cotton allotment for 1942 was 56,000 acres. This figure taken from our office records.

2. It is the opinion of this committee that 300 acres of unused cotton allotment acres would be available for redistribution. This is an estimate.

3. This committee believes that no acreage would be released on genuine cotton farms.

4. Under the present law our parish has received about 1,500 acres additional allotment due to war crop credits.

5. It is estimated that 50 genuine cotton farmers may be compelled to cease farming due to 1950 cotton allotments. Of this number it is the opinion of this committee that practically all would be tenants.

6. We have been advised by our State office that 35,000 cotton allotment acres will be available for noncotton farms for the State. This acreage will be used for old farms, not planting cotton in one of the years 1946, 1947, or 1948, and for new farms.

As stated before the estimates used are purely estimates and are taken from general talk and discussion with farmers.

We trust, however, this information may answer your questions in part.

Very truly yours,

JAMES R. GARLAND,
Parish Administrative Officer, Claiborne Parish.

ARKANSAS STATE HEADQUARTERS,
SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM,
Little Rock, Ark., November 21, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BECKWORTH: Your letter of November 17, 1949, asking whether, in the opinion of this headquarters, any agricultural section of Arkansas sent a higher percentage of its farmers to work in war plants than other sections, has been received.

The answer to your question is yes. The areas of our State where the soil was least productive sent a much larger percentage of the farmers to industry during the war than those areas where the soil was fertile and very productive. In the northwestern section of our State we have a rather large area of mountainous terrain where the soil is not very fertile. When you go south to the Arkansas River bottom area you find very fertile lands. In those unfertile lands in the northwestern area a large percentage of the farmers left the farms for industry. The same situation is true to some extent in the southwestern section of the State, south of the Arkansas River. It would be difficult for me to designate the specific counties from which the farm population went largely to industry, but it would be generally in the unfertile lands in northwestern Arkansas and the unfertile lands in southwestern Arkansas.

The Delta areas, along the Mississippi River side of the State and along the Arkansas River, did not lose many of its farm population to industry. In the latter part of the war a good many Negroes left the Delta section, particularly after they had been rejected for service in the armed forces. They went north and west to those points where they could make more money than they could make on the farms. But generally speaking, we did not lose such a large proportion of men to industry from the productive Delta area.

I trust this will give you the information desired.

Yours very truly,

E. L. COMPERE,
State Director.

NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS,
SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM,
Washington, D. C., December 16, 1949.

The Honorable LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: I have your note of December 2, 1949, appended to the copy of your letter from the director of selective service for the State of Arkansas relative to the farmers going to work in defense plants during the late war.

Director Compere seems to have given you a very good picture of what took place on Arkansas farms during the late war. It is reasonable to assume that similar movements of farmers occurred in other States. Furthermore, it was a common practice among some defense plants to operate bus lines as far out as 50 miles into poor farming areas for the purpose of bringing in workers to the plants each day.

In the Northeastern States, it was observed that many of the small-sized-farm operators increased the size of their enterprises by taking over the operation of small farms under rental agreements or by purchases. This brought some idle farms back into production and released some operators for work elsewhere.

While I have no data on the relative movements of farmers from different types of farming areas, it is reasonable to believe that a larger percentage left the subsistence and marginal type farming areas due to better remunerations offered elsewhere.

I hope this will be of some assistance to you and that you will feel free to call upon me at any time. Your communication is being returned as requested.

Sincerely yours,

LEWIS B. HERSHEY,
Director.

SELECTIVE SERVICE,
LOUISIANA STATE HEADQUARTERS,
New Orleans, La., December 22, 1949.

The Honorable LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: We have read with interest copy of General Compere's letter of November 21.

Undoubtedly Louisiana subsistence farmers were quicker to migrate to the better-paying war-industry employment than the agriculture worker in more productive farmland areas. You will probably find this true of all States with agricultural areas of low productivity.

We are returning herewith copy of General Compere's letter as requested.

With kindest regards and best holiday wishes, I am,

Yours very truly,

W. D. SHAFER,
Colonel (Retired), Deputy Director
(For the State Director).

STATE HEADQUARTERS,
SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM,
Jackson, Miss., December 19, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Congressman, Third District, Texas,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BECKWORTH: I have your letters from General Compere and also from Colonel Howell concerning the position of agricultural workers during World War II. The same situation as outlined by General Compere and Colonel Howell existed in the State of Mississippi, as indicated by all the records and from all information that I can obtain from the people who were with Selective Service during the war.

The records indicate that there was a much higher percentage of farmers who left the farm to go to industry from the hill sections and the most nonproductive agricultural sections than there were from the rich Delta section of the State. The reason for this, we think, was that where a farmer was not producing a creditable amount of foodstuff, he was not allowed exemption. Also, in the poorer sections the high salaries paid by industry were more attractive than in the richer sections where the farmers were making more money. We do not have any definite figures on this.

If we can furnish you any further information, we will be very glad to do so.

Cordially yours,

J. W. PATTON, Jr.,
Colonel, CE, State Director.

STATE HEADQUARTERS,
SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM,
Montgomery, Ala., December 7, 1949.

The Honorable LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BECKWORTH: I wish to acknowledge receipt of your handwritten note of December 2, 1949, on a copy of my letter of November 22, concerning disposition of agricultural workers during World War II. I also have a copy of the letter, dated November 21, 1949, from the Arkansas State Director of Selective Service on which you have appended a further note of December 5, 1949, on the same subject. In compliance with your request, I am returning both of these letters with this communication.

In further reply to your question, I believe that the experience in Alabama is very similar to that described by Gen. E. L. Compere, State director of selective service for Arkansas. In those areas in the State of Alabama where the soil was less productive, such areas sent a larger comparative number of men into war plants than those areas where the soil was more fertile. This movement of manpower was due, not only to the inducement of higher wages to those employed on submarginal lands, but also was due in part to the policy of selective service which granted deferment to agricultural workers only when they were producing an amount of foodstuff in excess of that required to feed the personnel and animals on the farm. Naturally, therefore, more deferments were granted for agricultural purposes in the more productive agricultural areas.

This headquarters will be glad to furnish you any other information which might possibly be of assistance to you in the matter now under consideration. Please do not hesitate to call on us for any assistance you may require.

Sincerely,

ERNEST W. HOWELL,
Colonel, AGD, State Director.

SELECTIVE SERVICE,
OKLAHOMA STATE HEADQUARTERS,
Oklahoma City, November 28, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
Third District, Texas,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BECKWORTH: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of November 17, 1949, in which you ask for an opinion as follows:

"In your opinion, did any agricultural section of your State send a higher percentage of its farmers into service than other sections?"

In reply to your request I should like to suggest that Oklahoma was slightly below the national average of men in the service who listed agriculture as their principal occupation. In general it appears that the better agricultural districts of Oklahoma did induct a lower percentage of men claiming to be farmers than other sections of the State where the farming activities appeared to be of a submarginal nature.

As a whole, I am inclined to believe that Selective Service was considerate of the farmers as a group.

Sincerely yours,

CLIVE E. MURRAY,
Colonel, AGD, State Director.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: In reply to your letter of December 5, 1949, I will say that your assumption is correct that the movement of agricultural workers from the farm to war industry did follow the same pattern as was reported by General Compere, of Arkansas.

In general, we may say, the eastern part of Oklahoma—that is, from the north and south line running through Oklahoma City—contains most of the industry of the State and a good part of all of the ranch land. In this part of the State we also find the timberland and only a small amount of rich, fertile land.

The western part of the State, particularly the northwestern region, is primarily the winter wheat belt of the State, and naturally is the fertile land. The same may be said of the southwestern part of the State, but normally a more diversified type of farming.

The heavy loss in population from the farms occurred primarily in the eastern and southeastern and southern part of the State of Oklahoma.

Hoping this will be of some assistance to you in the study of movement of farm labor to industry, I am,

Sincerely yours,

CLIVE E. MURRAY,
Colonel, AGD, State Director.

STATE HEADQUARTERS FOR

Congressman LINDLEY BECKWORTH,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: It is true that a larger number of agricultural workers left the sections of the State where farm land was less productive. This exodus from poor farms commenced in 1934 when the WPA was established.

Sincerely yours,

J. H. SKELTON, Jr.,
Deputy State Director.

STATE HEADQUARTERS,

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR LINDLEY: I have delayed in answering your notes of November 17 until I could exhaust all resources outside our office in trying to secure for you the information on the breakdown of agricultural workers during World War II in Texas. Am sorry to say I have had no success.

Our records in this headquarters were not maintained in such a manner that this information is available and could be furnished. I did think, however, that our good friend, E. F. Vance, might have this, but as you will see by his attached letter, they were unable to be of assistance in this wise.

Although we cannot say for other States, we do feel the same situation prevailed as is reflected in the letter from the State director, Brig. Gen. E. L. Compere, of Arkansas.

It was good to see you in Washington in June, and I do hope if you come this way you will give me the pleasure of buying your lunch.

With best personal regards, I remain,

Sincerely,

PAUL L. WAKEFIELD,
Colonel, AGD, State Director.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
College Station, Tex., December 14, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress, Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: While I have no figures to substantiate the statement, I am quite sure that the same thing happened in Texas that happened in Arkansas. Farm people from the less-productive soils went into industry to a much greater extent than those from the fertile soils of the State. Observation in this connection would indicate that more than 50 percent of the people in the less-productive areas went into industry. Of course, since many of the jobs have been terminated, a large percent of the people have returned to the farm.

I am returning the copy of your letter from Mr. Compere as you requested.

Sincerely yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State PMA Committee.

SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM,
MISSOURI STATE HEADQUARTERS,
Jefferson City, January 4, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: The situation that existed in Arkansas as described by Gen. E. L. Compere in his letter of November 21, 1949, is comparable to the situation in Missouri. The subsistence farmers who were not contributing to the war effort were used in war plants, and greater percentages of these farmers left the farm than those who were employed in a more fertile area.

If we can be of further assistance to you, please advise.

R. T. FINKS,
Deputy State Director
(For the State Director).

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WHITAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial written by Mr. W. C. Lasseter, of the Progressive Farmer. I think all Members of the House would enjoy reading it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in four instances.

ADJOURNMENT OVER FROM THURSDAY TO MONDAY NEXT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Thursday next, it adjourn to meet on the following Monday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House for 5 minutes today, following the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and the conclusion of special orders heretofore granted; and also to address the House for 5 minutes on Thursday next.

THE LATE HONORABLE STEPHEN A. DAY

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH].

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to announce the passing of our good friend and former colleague, Stephen A. Day. After an illness of several weeks he answered the call to the Great Beyond last Thursday.

He is survived by his widow, four daughters, and two sons. It is as fine a family as anyone could possibly know. They have our deepest sympathy.

Steve was the distinguished son of a distinguished father. His father, William Rufus Day, was Secretary of State in the Cabinet of President McKinley and for 20 years was justice of the United States Supreme Court.

Like his father, Steve was an ardent scholar. He was a recognized authority on the United States Constitution. During his period of service here in the House, from 1940 to 1944, when he represented Illinois as a Member at Large, many of us who served with him will recall the contribution he made to a better understanding of the constitutional questions that arose. Those who differed with his views always had the greatest respect for his sincerity and his legal knowledge.

Steve was born in Canton, Ohio. He attended the public schools there, and subsequently went to University School in Cleveland and Asheville School in North Carolina. He graduated from the University of Michigan in 1905, and since 1908 practiced law in Chicago. For a period, after graduation from college, he served as secretary to Chief Justice Fuller and later as special counsel to the Comptroller of the Currency.

In the fullest sense of the word Steve Day, like his father before him, devoted his life to serving the people. Although an ardent Republican, he always placed his country above any political consideration. And he has made an immeasurable contribution to his party and to his country. I have taken great pride in the fact that this fine and great man lived in my home town of Evanston, that it has been my privilege to have him as a personal friend and a constituent.

With the passing of Steve Day, I have lost a real friend, and the Nation has lost a most outstanding citizen. We shall miss him. His words and deeds in the service of the people for a freer, richer, and happier life constitute "footprints on the sands of time" which remain as a constant inspiration to all of us.

Mr. REED of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield to my colleague from Illinois.

Mr. REED of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it was with sadness last Friday that I read in the daily press of the passing, on the day previous, of Hon. Stephen A. Day, a former Member of the Seventy-seventh and Seventy-eighth Congresses, elected at large from the State of Illinois.

While I was acquainted with Stephen Day, prior to his first election to Congress in 1940, it was not until he had served here for several months that I really came to know him. He was quiet, friendly, and unassuming. He cared little for social life but invariably attended those functions wherein the welfare of his State was involved or the principles of government in which he was deeply concerned were likely to be discussed. Stephen Day was a graduate of the University of Michigan and practiced law in the city of Chicago for 41 years. He was the son of Hon. William R. Day, who was Secretary of State in the Cabinet of President McKinley and later an Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court. For several years prior to Stephen Day's Chicago law practice, he was secretary to Chief Justice Melville W. Fuller. No doubt his close association with the Chief Justice of the Court, of which his own father was a distinguished member, influenced Stephen Day to become an ardent student of the United States Constitution. He was likewise intensely interested in social problems and the rights of those who must earn their sustenance by manual labor. He was unswerving in his devotion to those principles and during his two congressional terms, no colleague of his had a more consistent record for urging adherence to the Constitution or for support of labor legislation than did he.

Prior to his election in 1940 he was a candidate for Congress five times and five times he was defeated. The fact that each time he chose to run for Congressman at Large, with the whole State as his district, and during election years when the political party with which he was affiliated had little or no hope of success, is evidence that he was not a seeker of public office, but a crusader for the principles of government for which he stood and that that was his method of bringing those principles to the attention of the public. He was the author of several books, the most well known being, The Constitutionalist, and We Must Save the Republic. During his congressional career he served on the Committee on Revision of the Laws and the Committee on Labor—committees that formulated legislation that was nearest to his heart. He was faithful and diligent in his committees and a conscientious Member of the House.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 days in which to extend their remarks on the life, character, and public service of the late Stephen Day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WAGNER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—THE BUDGET FOR 1951 (H. DOC. NO. 405)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am transmitting my recommendations for the Budget of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951.

This Budget is a statement of the financial program for the United States Government, under both existing laws and new legislation which I am recommending to the Congress. It is an expression, in financial terms, of the actions this Government can and should take at this time to build toward economic growth and the expansion of human freedom, in our own country and in the world.

For the fiscal year 1951, Budget expenditures under this financial program are estimated at 42.4 billion dollars, about 860 million dollars below estimated expenditures for the current year. Budget receipts under existing tax laws are estimated to be 37.3 billion dollars, a decrease of about 460 million dollars below the present year. The estimated Budget deficit for the fiscal year 1951 is thus 5.1 billion dollars under present tax laws, compared with an anticipated deficit of 5.5 billion dollars in the fiscal year 1950.

I shall shortly recommend to the Congress certain adjustments in our tax laws which will produce some net additional revenue in 1951, not reflected in this Budget. These adjustments will result in a larger revenue increase in subsequent years.

A reduction, greater than that in expenditures, has been made in the requests for new appropriations and other obligational authority in 1951. Expenditures occur when the Government pays its obligations, and the Congress grants authority to incur obligations when it enacts appropriations, contract authorizations, and authorizations to borrow from the Treasury. The authority to incur new obligations which I am recommending for the fiscal year 1951 totals 40.5 billion dollars, considerably below the 1950 level. This fact is significant as an indication that the downward trend in expenditures from 1950 to 1951 may be expected to continue.

Budget totals

[Fiscal years. In millions]

	1949 actual	1950 estimated	1951 estimated
Receipts	$38,246	$37,763	$37,306
Expenditures	40,057	43,297	42,439
Deficit	−1,811	−5,534	−5,133

NOTE.—Estimated receipts exclude new tax proposals.

This financial program provides a sound basis on which to proceed. It will properly support the extraordinary responsibilities of the Federal Government, both at home and abroad, and at the same time meet our obligation to pursue a policy of financial prudence and restraint. Such a policy must be directed at producing a surplus as soon as possible under favorable economic conditions. The reductions in expenditures, which I recommend, can be achieved and still permit our Government to carry on its necessary operations effectively. The moderate increase in revenue, which I shall recommend in conjunction with specific tax reforms, can be achieved without impairing continued economic progress.

In preparing this Budget, I have carefully evaluated the possible alternatives in the light of the realities of our present situation. The soundness of a fiscal program cannot properly be judged simply by the year-to-year change in the expected margin between receipts and expenditures. A prudent program must meet much broader tests, if it is to serve the long-range interests of our people.

The soundness of a fiscal program must first of all be judged by whether it allows the people, through their Government, to meet the demands which the foreign and domestic situations put upon them. The necessary functions of the Government in our complex society are varied and widespread. They require large expenditures but they are vital to our security, to the protection of our liberties, to continued social and economic progress, and to the welfare of our people. I have reviewed the expenditure programs in the Budget, one by one, and found them necessary to achieve these purposes. I am confident that the Congress will come to essentially the same conclusion.

The soundness of the Government's fiscal program must also be judged by its impact on the economy. The Federal Budget is a substantial part of the total flow of incomes and expenditures in our country each year. Federal receipts and expenditures must both be planned to encourage the prosperity of the economy and keep it healthy and growing. Irresponsible and short-sighted budgetary action could contribute to a worsening of the world situation and to a decline in production and employment in the United States. Under either of these circumstances, we would find ourselves faced by the necessity of Budget outlays much larger than those I am proposing, while the prospect for increased revenues would be much less encouraging. I am convinced that the recommendations I am making, both for expenditures and for revenues, will contribute to continued economic development.

The soundness of a fiscal program must be judged, finally, in the light of where that program will take us over a period of years. This is partly a matter of necessity: most Government programs are based on a time schedule extending over a number of years, and a large part of the Budget in any one year represents binding commitments to spend established in previous years on the one hand, and tax liabilities already incurred on the other. It is primarily a matter of wisdom: sharp and arbitrary changes in Government programs, even where feasible, involve economic loss and dislocations, and may cause serious damage to parts of the economy. I am confident that the fiscal recommendations provide a solid basis for moving toward budgetary balance in the next few years. My confidence is based on three main considerations.

First, it has been possible to reduce anticipated expenditures for the fiscal year 1951 by close to 1 billion dollars below the estimated level for 1950, and an even greater reduction has been made in the request for new obligational authority. Thus, the policies followed in preparing this Budget will permit further reductions in subsequent years. Specifically, the largest item in the Budget, national defense expenditures, is expected to approximate the 1951 level in the next few years; and the costs of our foreign aid and veterans' programs should continue the decline already expected between 1950 and 1951. It should also be possible in future years to reduce the cost of programs which have helped to meet the postwar transition problems of specific major areas of our economy, notably the support of agricultural prices and the creation of an adequate secondary market for housing mortgages. Finally, if the Congress enacts the proposed increase in postal rates, the burden of the postal deficit on recent Budgets will be largely eliminated.

The programs mentioned above constitute the bulk of the Federal Budget. With respect to other programs, relating primarily to domestic activities, Federal responsibilities will increase as the Nation grows. But the additional budgetary requirements for these programs, under a prudent fiscal policy, should be substantially less than the decline to be expected in the extraordinary postwar programs. In this connection it should be emphasized that the urgently needed insurance measures which are recommended in the fields of unemployment compensation, old-age security, and medical care will be primarily financed by special taxes designed to defray their costs.

Thus, assuming continued favorable economic and international developments, it is possible to plan on further reductions in total expenditures after 1951.

The second major consideration supporting my confidence in this fiscal program is the fact that our economy is a dynamic and growing one. Each year our population and the productivity of our labor force rise, and our total national output must rise also if we are to fulfill our obligation to maintain high employment. As our economy grows, tax revenues will grow also. The effects of this growth are not fully reflected in the receipts estimates for 1951, because the temporary decline in incomes during this past year will affect some tax yields in 1951.

Federal expenditures are themselves of fundamental importance to our prospects for steady economic growth. Programs for such purposes as national defense and international recovery are essential to maintain a favorable international situation. In addition, many Federal expenditures constitute direct supports for important sectors of our economy, or direct investments in assets such as power facilities or in better education and other services, which add to the productive capacity of the Nation. Thus this Budget is not only consistent with an expanding economy, but will make a substantial contribution to that objective.

In analyzing the economic impact of Federal financial operations on our economy, increasing attention is also being paid to the aggregate of Federal cash transactions with the public, which are not fully reflected in the totals of Budget expenditures and receipts. Primarily important is the fact that, as long as the social insurance trust funds are building reserves to cover liabilities in future years, they show a substantial excess of receipts over payments. Therefore, the current economic impact of Federal financial activities, as reflected in the net difference between all cash receipts from and all cash payments to the public, is usually different from that indicated by the Budget surplus or deficit. In 1951, for example, the excess of cash payments over receipts is estimated at 2.7 billion dollars, 2.4 billion dollars less than the estimated Budget deficit. Continuing improvement in our fiscal position, which our present plans should achieve, will therefore probably result in an excess of total cash income over cash outgo before the Budget will show a surplus. This aspect of our over-all fiscal position is important in supporting the basic economic soundness of the fiscal program, although it does not lessen the need for the greatest possible prudence in the conduct of our financial operations as reflected in the Budget, which is the proper instrument of Executive and Legislative control.

The third major consideration supporting the soundness of this fiscal program is the fact that the tax recommendations which I shall transmit to the Congress will both improve our tax structure and place us in a better position to meet our continuing fiscal requirements. It is highly important that we begin to make the basic changes in the tax system which are needed to make it more equitable and to provide better incentives for producing the amounts and types of investment, consumption, and savings which will contribute to an expanding economy. The large and badly devised tax reduction of 1948 sharply limits the extent to which we can make changes at the present time. Nevertheless, we can and should make now some of the changes which are needed in our tax laws, and bring nearer the time when the Budget can be balanced. Because of the time lag in tax collections after changes in the law, and the fact that some of the changes will result in an immediate loss in revenue, the tax recommendations which I shall submit to the Congress will produce less additional revenue in 1951 than in subsequent years, when the changes will be fully effective.

For all these reasons, the financial program which I am recommending represents a sound, long-range basis on which to plan our governmental operations at this time. It is directed at achieving a budgetary balance in the only way in which it can be achieved—by measures which support rather than impair the continued growth of our country. It is based on expenditure plans which can be sustained in the years following 1951 without embarrassment to our fiscal position. Its accomplishment does, however, depend upon our continued self-control in holding expenditure programs to no more than necessary levels.

As in all recent years, the Budget for 1951 is dominated by financial requirements to pay the costs of past wars and to achieve a peaceful world. Estimated expenditures for these purposes are 30 billion dollars, or about 71 percent of the total Budget. This is a reduction of 1.8 billion dollars from estimated expenditures for the same purposes in 1950. National defense and international programs, designed to insure our security and to create the economic and political conditions necessary for world peace, will require about 18 billion dollars. Veterans' programs and interest on the public debt, commitments arising mainly from the last war, will require about 12 billion dollars.

Our unprecedentedly large expenditures in recent years for international programs have been undertaken to assist free peoples to recover from the devastation of the war and to restore their capacity for future growth both in material things and in the practice of democratic principles. These programs are proving to be an investment paying dividends, far beyond their cost, in enhancing our own security and in providing a basis for world peace and prosperity. The job is not yet done, the goals are not yet reached; but the progress so far achieved makes possible in 1951 a substantial reduction in the dollar costs of these programs. Total expenditures for international affairs and finance are estimated at 4.7 billion dollars, a reduction of 1.3 billion dollars from 1950. This amount reflects the minimum requirements for these programs, and their success to date emphasizes the compelling need to carry them through on the planned basis.

As progress is made toward achieving the short-range objectives of recovery and relief, two other international activities assume increasing importance. First, I am renewing the recommendation for a program of technical and capital assistance to underdeveloped countries. The Budget expenditures in 1951 will be relatively small but they represent a step of great significance in the encouragement of world economic expansion and the growth of world trade, which are essential to our national prosperity. Second, I am recommending additional funds in 1951 for the mutual defense assistance program, authorized by the Congress last year, and now getting under way. This program is a necessary supplement to economic growth as a bulwark against aggression, and is an integral part of the cooperative effort to assure the continued independence of free nations.

Expenditures for national defense must be sufficient to provide us with the balanced military strength we must maintain in the present world situation, at a level which can be sustained over a period of years. In 1951, expenditures for national defense are estimated at 13.5 billion dollars, an increase of about 400 million dollars over 1950. The present level of expenditures is substantially less than was anticipated a year ago, and is the result of careful Budget planning and vigorous administrative action.

Expenditures for veterans' services and benefits are estimated at 6.1 billion dollars in 1951, a decline of 825 million dollars from 1950. Our veterans' programs represent commitments which the Government has made to those who have served in its armed forces, and these commitments must be met. While that part which represents pensions, medical care, and similar services will continue to rise gradually, the program of readjustment benefits was intended to be transitional, and we should plan on a continued reduction in its cost during the next few years.

Interest on the public debt is estimated at 5.6 billion dollars in 1951, slightly lower than in 1950. This is, of course, a fixed commitment of the Government, and represents predominantly the cost of financing the last war.

All expenditures, other than those for international, national defense, and veterans' programs, and interest on the debt, total 12.5 billion dollars, about 29 percent of the total Budget. This is an increase of about 1 billion dollars from estimated expenditures for these purposes in 1950. They include many important activities such as the Atomic Energy Commission and the Maritime Commission, which are closely related to our national security. Furthermore, they represent those positive functions which Government must fulfill if we are to have a healthy and growing economy. Federal expenditures for these purposes in 1951 are expected to constitute a substantially lower percentage of the total national income than the corresponding percentage in 1939.

The 12.5 billion dollars which this Budget provides for these domestic programs, viewed item by item, reflects—and has been generally recognized by the Congress to reflect—the necessary contributions of the Federal Government in our modern economy. The major question in my mind is not whether we are doing too much, but whether the budgetary requirements of the major national security and war-connected programs have constrained us to undertake too little toward supporting and stimulating the realization of our country's great potential development. It must be recognized that failure to support essential Federal activities would impede the continued expansion upon which the well-being of our economy and the soundness of the Government's fiscal position alike depend.

Expenditures in this Budget, designed to assist economic development in the categories of housing and community development, agriculture, natural resources, transportation and communication, finance, commerce, and industry, and labor, together amount to 7.9 billion dollars, 19 percent of total estimated expenditures.

We must push ahead, for example, with atomic energy development, and the Budget provides 817 million dollars for this purpose. We must maintain and develop adequate aviation facilities and services, for which 230 million dollars is included. The Federal Government should continue to assist States in developing an adequate national highway system; Federal expenditures for this purpose are estimated at 507 million dollars in 1951. The development of our rivers for flood control, navigation, reclamation, power, and other uses is of fundamental importance for economic growth, and is largely a Federal responsibility, for which this Budget includes 1.4 billion dollars. The Government is substantially aiding private industry and local communities in producing more and better housing at prices people can afford; 1.3 billion dollars is included for these purposes. Over 800 million dollars is provided to further the conservation of farm lands and to make loans for extending electricity to farms.

There is one aspect of these expenditures which has properly received widespread attention by the Congress and the public as having an important bearing on the long-run fiscal position of the Government. Many expenditures represent the acquisition of assets which are recoverable or will give continuing returns in future years, and which in normal business accounting would not usually be considered as current expense. It is estimated that in the 1951 Budget such expenditures, excluding military public works and equipment, amount to about 5.6 billion dollars, of which about 4 billion dollars is anticipated to be in the recoverable category. In the case of the Federal Government, in contrast to private business, these investment expenditures cannot properly be financed differently from other items in the Budget. But their size and nature are important in evaluating the strength of our fiscal position. A special analysis of the nature and extent of investment expenditures is included in part III of the Budget this year for the first time.

Economic growth must be matched by comparable development in the social well-being and living standards of all our people. Continued progress depends in large part upon the increasing fulfillment of the responsibilities of Government in such fields as social welfare, education, and public health. In addition to the transfer of 594 million dollars of pay-roll taxes to the railroad retirement trust fund, the Budget proposes total funds of 2.1 billion dollars for social welfare, health, and security, and 434 million dollars for education and general research, about one-sixteenth of total Federal expenditures. These, too, are investments in the future of our country. Over 80 percent of these funds is for grants to States and localities.

The remaining programs, classified under general government, are estimated to cost 1.3 billion dollars. These funds provide for over-all legislative, judicial, and executive operations of the Government, and for various central services such as the maintenance of public buildings. Included in this total are 424 million dollars for tax collection and other financial operations, and 333 million dollars for the Government's payment to the civil service retirement fund.

The detailed activities of Government agencies in all fields have been closely reviewed to eliminate all but the minimum operations required. This has made necessary the denial of request after request for additional funds which—taken by themselves and in the judgment of particular groups affected—are highly meritorious. The progress made in this Budget in reversing the trend toward higher expenditures and in achieving a substantial reduction has been made possible only by the most vigorous application, in every area, of a policy of holding the numerous activities to essential levels.

In a very few cases—mainly middle-income housing—the exigencies of particular situations justify the recommendation of limited new domestic programs. In addition, I am renewing proposals previously made for aid to education and expanded public assistance, primarily in the form of grants to States, and for the enactment of certain social insurance legislation which would be financed primarily by special taxes. Beyond this, however, I am recommending no new programs which would require large expenditures in future years, above the amounts included in this Budget. In the case of existing programs, while vigorous effort is being devoted to improving their efficiency, they must in the public interest be given sufficient funds to allow effective operation.

The rise from 2.5 billion dollars in 1950 to 3.1 billion dollars in 1951 in estimated civil public works expenditures, including grants and loans, reflects almost entirely the minimum requirements of projects and programs now under way. With respect to Federal public works in such fields as reclamation, flood control, and rivers and harbors, this Budget does not provide for starting any new projects, despite the pressures that exist for initiating construction of a large number of additional projects which are already authorized. Federal grants to States for public works have also been generally limited to the necessary costs required to carry forward continuing construction programs, primarily those for highways, airports, and hospitals.

Our policies with respect to expenditures must of course remain flexible to meet shifts in international or economic conditions. The policies I have outlined represent the sound and necessary basis for Budget programs in the light of the outlook at this time.

MANAGEMENT IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM

The past year has been one of outstanding achievement in improving the organization and operating methods of the executive branch. This is an important fact to note in the Budget Message as the accomplishment of better management in Government is essential to the fulfillment of our established fiscal goals. It is also a responsibility to which every official must give increased attention if the public is to receive a full return on its tax dollar. Action has been taken on many fronts. To cite but a few: the Department of State has been reorganized; improved operating methods have been installed in the Treasury Department; further progress toward unification has been made with the creation of a Department of Defense; central service functions of the Government have been reorganized in the General Services Administration; significant reorganizations have occurred in the Post Office Department, the Department of Commerce, and the Civil Service Commission.

In cooperation with the Congress, I intend to continue a vigorous program to achieve further improvements in governmental management.

One phase of this program requires the enactment of legislation and the approval of reorganization plans. During the coming year I recommend that the Congress enact basic personnel legislation to make possible further improvements in the way the Government recruits, trains, and supervises its employees. I also recommend that the Congress take action to allow the Post Office to maintain its own accounts and conduct its financial affairs on a businesslike basis and to permit appointment of postmasters by the Postmaster General.

During the session I shall transmit to the Congress a number of reorganization plans. The objective of these plans will be the establishment of clear lines of responsibility and authority for the management of Government activities and the more effective grouping of Government programs within departments and agencies.

A second phase of the management improvement program includes Government-wide activities in which all agencies participate. Major undertakings in this area are the installation of more efficient property and records management practices under the leadership of the General Services Administration; strengthening of personnel management activities under the leadership of the Civil Service Commission; and institution, under the sponsorship of the Bureau of the Budget, of systematic review by all agencies of operating effectiveness and economy as required by the Classification Act of 1949. In addition, more modern accounting practices are being installed throughout the Government under the guidance of a joint committee consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller General, and the Director of the Budget.

In the field of programing and budgeting, the progress made toward presentation of this 1951 Budget on a "performance" basis is an example of results stemming from the improvement program. An examination of the body of this document will indicate a substantial change from that of previous years. The activities for which funds are recommended are described so that the Congress and the citizens may see more clearly the relationship between the activities to be performed and the costs of those activities. Future Budget documents will include additional improvements. Some of these will reflect current efforts both to strengthen and simplify Government accounting and to develop better measures of work performance. Others will provide additional kinds of analyses to enable examination and understanding of the Budget from different standpoints.

The third aspect of the management improvement program is the work being done by individual departments and agencies. I have instructed each department and agency head to inaugurate an aggressive program of management improvement in his department. These departmental programs have been reviewed in terms of their relation to financial requirements and their contribution to the solution of known problems. I will announce shortly certain areas to which priority will be given in the management improvement work of the executive branch during the year 1950. The special fund for management improvement which was authorized by the Congress last year will be utilized to carry out some of the specific projects. In following through to secure results from this entire program I will have the assistance and advice of my Advisory Committee on Management Improvement.

Under our Federal form of government, many public services are the common concern of Federal, State, and local government. Continuing attention needs to be given by all levels of government to the problems arising from the interrelations of our tax systems and the administration of common governmental functions. Federal and State and local officials are currently studying the possibilities of further cooperative arrangements in tax administration in order to reduce costs and improve coordination. We are also cooperating in developing legislative proposals to deal with several current problems of mutual concern: provision of certain local services to Federal personnel, application of local taxes to personnel and transactions on Federal reservations, and the establishment of a general system of payments to State and local governments whose property-tax base has been reduced by Federal acquisitions of real estate.

The reports of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government have provided the framework for much of the improved organization and management which has been achieved and which I hope to achieve during the coming year. While work has been started in a number of the areas containing the greatest potential for economy and improved operations, many further legislative and administrative actions are needed. It should be realized that the greater effectiveness and economy and better service to the public, which come from improved management, are the cumulative result of a great many individual actions. Realization of those goals requires the coordinated and unrelenting efforts of all Federal officials and employees. We must continue to emphasize the achievement of better management as an important part of the job of public service in which the Congress and the executive branch are engaged.

BUDGET RECEIPTS

Budget receipts in the fiscal year 1951 are estimated at 37.3 billion dollars under existing tax legislation, 457 million dollars below the estimate for the current year. Decreased collections from corporation income taxes account for the principal decline in receipts between the 2 years, reflecting the fact that the reduction in corporate profits from the calendar year 1948 peak does not have its full effect on tax receipts until the fiscal year 1951. The estimates of receipts assume economic activity at approximately the same level as at the present time.

I will shortly transmit to the Congress my recommendations for changes in our tax laws to provide a more balanced and equitable tax structure and to increase Federal revenues. The net increase in revenues during 1951 will be substantially smaller than in subsequent years, owing to the time required for some of the changes to become fully effective.

NOTE.—Estimated receipts for 1951 exclude new tax proposals, except for recommended changes in employment taxes and miscellaneous receipts.

Direct taxes on individuals: Receipts from the income tax on individuals exceed those from any other tax. The total of 18.9 billion dollars estimated for 1951 for direct taxes on individuals is practically unchanged from the 1950 total, and reflects continued high levels of employment and income.

Direct taxes on corporations: The fiscal year 1951 estimate of receipts from taxes on corporations is 10.5 billion dollars. During the fiscal year 1951 corporations will pay income tax on the profits earned during the calendar years 1949 and 1950. The decline in profits from the peak level of 1948 will therefore adversely affect these receipts for the fiscal year 1951.

Excises and customs: Under present laws, very little change is anticipated in collections of excise taxes and customs.

Employment taxes: The tax rate for old-age and survivors insurance was increased from 1 to 1½ percent on the first of this month; hence the receipts estimate for 1950 includes taxes based upon both the old rate and the new. Receipts for 1951 under existing legislation represent a full year's collection at the new higher rate.

I have recommended expansion and improvement of the old-age and survivors insurance system and a new program of medical care insurance. It is estimated that the additional taxes to be collected for these programs will amount to 1.4 billion dollars in 1951. Since these sums will be transferred immediately to trust accounts, Budget receipts will not be increased.

Miscellaneous receipts: Miscellaneous receipts have been declining steadily since 1947, primarily because of the drop in sales of surplus property originally acquired for war purposes. During 1951 receipts from surplus property will be only about 0.1 billion dollars compared to the peak of 2.9 billion dollars in 1947.

There are other decreases in the estimates of miscellaneous receipts which are in the nature of changes in reporting. Certain receipts, notably of the Farmers' Home Administration and of the public housing program, were formerly deposited into miscellaneous receipts, but are now deducted from the expenditures of the programs involved. These changes, of course, have no effect on the surplus or deficit.

The estimate of miscellaneous receipts for 1951 reflects my recommendation that legislation be enacted to permit the acceleration of capital repayment by the Federal home-loan banks. An increase in patent fees is also necessary to make the Patent Office more nearly self-supporting.

Refunds of receipts: Refunds for 1951 are estimated at about the same level as for the current year, 0.7 billion dollars less than in 1949. The decline is the result of the fact that 1949 refunds were unusually high because of the retroactive features of the Revenue Act of 1948.

PUBLIC DEBT

The public debt amounted to 252.8 billion dollars on June 30, 1949. Estimated Budget deficits of 5.5 billion dollars in the fiscal year 1950 and 5.1 billion dollars in the fiscal year 1951, together with certain minor adjustments, will cause the debt to increase to 263.8 billion dollars by the end of 1951. In 1951, about 2.5 billion dollars of the increase in the debt will be financed by new investments in Federal securities by trust accounts and other Government agencies.

BUDGET EXPENDITURES AND AUTHORIZATIONS

A summary of Budget expenditures according to the broad programs or functions for which the money is spent is set forth in the table below. This table includes all expenditures from the general and special funds of the Treasury and the net expenditures of wholly owned Government corporations. Expenditures from the trust funds are excluded.

[1] In addition, 851 million dollars of reserved 1950 contract authorizations and 22 million dollars of 1950 appropriations will be available for 1951 programs.

[2] This Budget also includes 4,514 million dollars of appropriations to liquidate prior year contract authorizations.

All expenditures flow from obligational authority enacted by the Congress. The net new appropriations and other authorizations recommended for the fiscal year 1951 total 40.5 billion dollars. Of this total, 33.1 billion dollars is now formally recommended for action by the Congress, while 7.4 billion dollars is tentatively estimated for later submission. In addition, this Budget includes appropriations of 4.5 billion dollars to liquidate obligations incurred under prior year contract authorizations, more than half in programs for the national defense.

Since contracts with industry must be let well ahead of deliveries, a considerable lead time is required for the economical operation of many Government programs. This is especially true for public works and military procurement. Financial obligations incurred in prior years, therefore, will have already fixed a substantial part of the estimated Budget expenditures for 1951. Of the total Budget expenditures of 42.4 billion dollars estimated for 1951, about 12.1 billion dollars, 29 percent, will be payments for obligations incurred in 1950 or in earlier years; the remainder will be for 1951 obligations.

Net new appropriations recommended for 1951 are 1.6 billion dollars less than those estimated for 1950. They represent total appropriations (including permanent appropriations) less those to be used to liquidate prior year contract authorizations. New contract authorizations (which will require later appropriations to liquidate) totaling 3.4 billion dollars are also included in this Budget, also about 1.6 billion dollars less than the estimated new contract authority for 1950.

Special authorizations to use the proceeds of Treasury borrowing in the financing of certain Government programs are included in the 1951 recommendations to the amount of 1.4 billion dollars. This represents a decline of 6 billion dollars from the 1950 estimate for this type of authorization. The estimate for 1950, however, anticipates action by the Congress in providing supplemental public debt authorizations of 2 billion dollars for the Commodity Credit Corporation, one-half billion dollars for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and stand-by borrowing authority of 1.7 billion dollars for the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation and the Federal home loan banks.

PROGRAMS

The following sections describe the programs undertaken in each of the major functions of the Government and the new proposals I am making in this Budget. In addition, this year for the first time the Budget contains (in part II) improved presentations showing in detail the programs and performance of all Government agencies.

International affairs and finance

In 1951, as in every year since the war, the cost of our international programs will be large because far-reaching problems remain to be solved. Notable progress has been made toward foreign economic recovery, but some of the most difficult steps lie ahead. The threat of aggression still exists, requiring continued efforts to bolster the defenses of free nations. The economic underdevelopment of great areas of the world deprives their peoples of the adequate living standards in which free institutions can flourish, and deprives other peoples of needed resources which expanded world trade could bring.

The 1951 Budget provides for 4.7 billion dollars of expenditures on our international activities. This is 1.3 billion dollars, or more than 20 percent, below estimated expenditures in 1950. This very substantial reduction reflects the declining costs of our recovery and relief programs as they have stimulated and supported economic reconstruction, rising living standards, and growing political stability. My recommendations for 1951 represent the minimum amount required to carry our plans forward toward a successful conclusion. The continuing and grave uncertainties which remain in the world situation make it imperative that we be prepared to adjust our efforts to accord with developments. If, however, we make at this time the investment necessary to achieve continued economic recovery, I expect the trend in total expenditures for our international activities to continue downward in subsequent years.

Recovery and relief costs, which in 1951 will be over 75 percent of international expenditures, will diminish rapidly as recovery programs near completion, although new measures may become necessary to attain specific objectives in particular areas. At the same time, our programs for stimulating foreign economic development assume increasing importance, and expenditures for this purpose should increase somewhat in future years as political conditions stabilize and opportunities for mutually advantageous technological improvement and productive investment abroad increase. Furthermore, expenditures for foreign military assistance will remain substantial for several years as shipments are made under the programs authorized in 1950 and proposed for 1951.

[1] Includes transfer from funds for aid to occupied areas.
[2] Less than one-half million dollars.
[3] This Budget also includes 518 million dollars of appropriations to liquidate prior year contract authorizations.

Conduct of foreign affairs: Expenditures in 1951 for the State Department, through which we conduct our foreign affairs, will be about the same as for the current year. The decline of war claims payments will be about offset by increased requirements in other programs, notably the Department's recent assumption of responsibilities in Germany. The international information and education program will continue at the expanded level to be reached this year.

Our Government also participates in many international agencies, principally the United Nations and its affiliates. Through such participation we are actively engaged in a cooperative and world-wide effort to build the foundations for continued peace and the social and economic betterment of all peoples. One important aspect of this effort has been the development of a set of principles and a mechanism, through the proposed International Trade Organization, for facilitating the growth of world trade on a multilateral basis. I again urge that Congress approve the charter of the International Trade Organization and pass the necessary implementing legislation.

European recovery program: A major problem of foreign policy today is the fact that certain key areas of the world, principally western Europe, are faced with the necessity of making fundamental and complex adjustments to the far-reaching changes in their trade and financial relationships which resulted from the war. The great achievement of the European recovery program to date has been to help these countries to recover from the devastation of war, to restore living standards, and to maintain political stability, and thus to place them in a position to make the adjustments that are required.

As a consequence of their situation, these countries have experienced an extraordinary need in recent years for commodities and equipment which could, for the most part, be supplied only by this country, but for which they were not able to pay by the export of goods and services. If we had permitted their imports to sink to the temporarily reduced level which they could finance, it would have drastically reduced their living standards and invited unrest and destructive economic nationalism. Instead, we have undertaken a planned and mutual effort designed to achieve, during a relatively short period of United States assistance, expanded foreign production and trade, an increase in exports yielding dollars and a lessening need for imports requiring dollars, and an increased international flow of investment capital, thus establishing the basis for economic growth and prosperity.

The European recovery program has made notable progress toward these objectives since its inception almost 2 years ago. As a result, 1951 appropriation requirements for all segments of the program, including that portion of our aid to western Germany which has previously been provided separately from funds for aid to occupied areas, will be more than 1 billion dollars below the amounts provided by the Congress for the same purposes in 1950. Serious obstacles, however, remain to be surmounted. A substantial expansion in international trade and investment is necessary if the remaining adjustments are to be completed without involving serious economic and political dislocation.

The past year has shown that this task will not be easy. To achieve an increased flow of trade and investment will require far-sighted and vigorous steps by the European countries, and by other nations as well, including our own, if international economic relationships are to be established on a sound basis. The funds included in this Budget for continuing our participation in the European recovery program are an essential element for further progress.

Other international recovery and relief programs: Our economic aid to occupied areas similarly takes the form of recovery programs designed to balance their trade at levels adequate to maintain stability without continued United States assistance. During the current fiscal year, responsibility for economic aid to western Germany has been transferred from the Department of the Army to the Economic Cooperation Administration, and these costs will be met in 1951 from European recovery program funds. Army-administered aid to occupied areas in 1951 will therefore be limited almost wholly to Japan and the Ryukyu Islands. The substantial sums invested in Japanese recovery since the end of the war are yielding results which permit a reduction in 1951 outlays for this purpose, and bring us nearer to termination of this program.

Although I have urged the Congress to authorize a similar recovery program for the Republic of Korea, funds provided to date permit operation at only a relief level. Early enactment of the legislation now pending will permit recovery to proceed and hasten the date when our aid can be concluded. The estimates in this Budget anticipate a start toward recovery in the remainder of the current fiscal year and substantial further progress in 1951.

Our remaining international requirements for purposes of relief, as contrasted with recovery, are chiefly those for assistance to refugees. The work of the International Refugee Organization will extend through 1951; its remaining work load, however, is substantially reduced, allowing a 65 percent reduction in our contribution below the 1950 level. The estimate for the Displaced Persons Commission reflects my recommendation that the present Displaced Persons Act be speedily amended to make it fair and workable. The provision for aid to Palestine refugees is the present estimate of our share of the cost of the proposed United Nations' program for restoring to productive activity the several hundred thousand persons displaced during the recent conflict in Palestine.

Foreign economic development: Since the end of the war, the urgent, though temporary, requirements for international recovery and relief have of necessity taken priority over longer-range efforts to promote world economic development. The devastation left by war had to be overcome. The restoration of economic strength to the world's principal industrial areas necessarily had to precede any real economic progress in the less-developed parts of the world.

Now that recovery is well under way, we must increasingly turn our attention to measures for the gradual and permanent expansion of world production, trade, and living standards which are necessary for enduring world peace. Great potentialities for such expansion lie in the underdeveloped areas of the world, with resulting benefits to the peoples of these areas and to other countries, including our own.

I again urge the Congress to authorize a program of technical assistance to enable the peoples of these areas to learn, and to adapt to their own needs, modern technological and scientific knowledge in such fields as agriculture, health, education, transportation, and industry. The achievements of our present technical assistance activities in the American Republics and in Europe attest to the success and practicability of this approach. This budget provides for expenditures of 25 million dollars for the new program. This includes the United States share in the cost of the program for technical assistance recently approved by the United Nations.

A second basic requirement for economic progress in underdeveloped areas is a substantial increase in the inflow of capital for productive investment. These areas should offer opportunities for private capital and private enterprise, if there is assurance of fair and equitable treatment for foreign capital such as is contained in the commercial treaties which are now being negotiated with many nations. Nevertheless, there will remain certain abnormal risks which deter potential investors, and I again urge the enactment of legislation authorizing an experimental program by the Export-Import Bank to guarantee private developmental investments against such risks.

In many cases the flow of private capital may not be available or adequate, or particular circumstances may make governmental action preferable. In such cases, the investment of public funds may be needed, through such institutions as the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the Export-Import Bank. These institutions are currently directing their emphasis to loans for developmental purposes.

Foreign military assistance: Although economic recovery is the most essential condition to the maintenance of freedom and stability in western Europe and other regions of vital importance to our own security, economic vitality alone will not suffice to prevent aggression. Stronger military defenses are required, but these nations cannot unaided strengthen their defenses to a point sufficient to deter aggression without seriously retarding their recovery efforts. To solve their dilemma and to strengthen our own defenses, we agreed last year to unite with our neighbors of the North Atlantic community in developing and putting into effect an integrated defense plan for that area.

We have implemented that decision through the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949, which provides for the supply of arms to the Treaty nations to supplement their own defense measures. The act also continues our previous program of assistance to Greece and Turkey, which has already achieved substantial success in ending the guerrilla threat to Greek independence and in strengthening Turkish defenses. In addition the act provides for military aid to certain other areas in the Middle and Far East.

The North Atlantic Treaty nations are now proceeding with the development of an integrated defense plan, the translation of that plan into equipment and supply needs, and a realistic determination of what each participant can do, both for itself and for the others, in meeting those requirements. For the current year the Congress provided 1 billion dollars for military assistance to the Treaty nations, and 359 million dollars for the other nations covered by the act. For the fiscal year 1951 I am recommending new obligational authority of 1.1 billion dollars, including 500 million dollars new contract authority.

Except for the previously authorized Greek-Turkish program, expenditures in 1950 will be relatively low, owing to late enactment of the new program and the time required for agreement on joint plans and for the subsequent determination of detailed requirements. Expenditures in 1951 for foreign military assistance will be almost twice as great as in 1950, and may rise somewhat further thereafter, owing to the long delivery time characteristic of military procurement.

Philippine aid: The special concern and responsibility we feel for the progress of the Philippine Republic have taken the principal form, since the war, of assistance in the physical rehabilitation of damaged facilities and the payment of war damage claims. The cost of both of these programs will decline sharply in 1951 as they approach completion. We will continue to follow with sympathetic interest the achievements of the Philippine people and to assist them in making their contribution to our common objectives.

National defense

Our expenditures for national defense continue to be the largest item in the budget. Under current world circumstances, in which the strength of the United States is making such a vital contribution toward world peace, we must continue to make the expenditures necessary to maintain a position of relative military readiness. At the same time, we must plan our expenditures for national defense so that we will achieve our purpose at a reasonable cost, well within our capacity to sustain over a period of years.

This budget represents a further step toward these objectives. It provides for active forces in a high state of training, available for immediate use if necessary and as a nucleus for rapid expansion in the event of an emergency, and for reserve forces, organized and trained for early mobilization if necessary. This budget contemplates the continued development of planning for industrial mobilization and the accumulation of a stockpile of strategic and critical materials. It continues to emphasize research and development to keep our military technology abreast of scientific developments, and procurement of newly developed weapons to improve the equipment of the ready forces. At the same time this program is sufficiently flexible to provide a basis for rapid changes should developments in technology or international conditions make them necessary.

The recommendations for national defense in this budget take into account the progress which has been made and can reasonably be anticipated in the programs now being developed for the effective integration of our defense plans and organizations with those of other North Atlantic Treaty nations. These defense plans, together with our assistance in strengthening the forces of these countries through the mutual defense assistance program, should provide an increasing measure of security to free peoples on both sides of the Atlantic as well as elsewhere in the world.

For the past 2 years we have been adjusting our military programs to achieve a balanced structure which can be maintained over a period of years without an undue use of national resources. The National Security Act of 1947 and the amendments to that act in 1949 have provided a sound organizational framework within which to work toward this objective. Vigorous actions have been taken to reduce overhead, to improve efficiency, to eliminate activities of low priority, and to realine our armed forces in accordance with a unified strategic concept. As a result, the estimate of obligational authority for the 1951 program of the Department of Defense, including certain obligations in 1951 from 1950 authority, is 13 billion dollars, as compared with 14.2 billion dollars recommended for 1950 in the budget a year ago.

My recommendations in this budget provide for balanced land, naval, and air forces. In order to avoid the creation of forces involving commitments over a period of years beyond what we could reasonably expect to provide, I have had placed in reserve certain authorizations for the current year which were provided primarily for the expansion of the Air Force. These recommendations for the Defense Department for 1951 contemplate substantially the continuation of the revised 1950 program.

The estimated obligational authority of 13.7 billion dollars for 1951 includes 4.0 billions for the Army, 3.9 billions for the Navy, and 4.4 billions for the Air Force. In addition the recommendations include 0.8 billion for other Department of Defense activities, including retired pay and proposed legislation; and 0.6 billion for other national defense activities, mainly stockpiling of strategic and critical materials. Of this obligational authority expected to be required in 1951, 11.4 billion dollars is appropriations and 1.4 billion dollars is contract authorizations, both requiring action by the Congress. In addition, 873 million dollars is to come from appropriations and contract authorizations which were placed in reserve in 1950 and are available for 1951 needs.

The estimated expenditures for national defense in 1951 of 13.5 billions, including stock piling and other defense items, are an increase of about 400 million dollars from estimated expenditures for 1950. The increase results almost entirely from procurement and other commitments made under authorizations previously approved by the Congress. Expenditures in subsequent years will reflect the reduction of new obligational authority for 1951.

Military strength: Extension of authority for selective service, for which I plan to submit legislation, is vital as a positive demonstration of our resolve to maintain the strength of the free world. With it we will retain our ability to expand our armed forces rapidly in an emergency and will also insure adequate replacements to maintain the required strength of our active forces.

The extension of selective service authority will provide a temporary solution to the military manpower problem of the active forces, but will leave unsolved the problem of trained manpower for our reserve forces. I point out again the necessity of a program of universal training, if we are to provide on a continuing basis sufficient numbers of men for the reserve forces, adequately trained to use effectively the increasingly complex machines of war.

[1] Includes appropriations of 22 million dollars made for the fiscal year 1950 which will be available for obligation in the fiscal year 1951.

[2] Includes contract authorizations of 851 million dollars made for the fiscal year 1950 which will be available for obligation in the fiscal year 1951.

[3] This budget also includes 2,533 million dollars of appropriations to liquidate prior year contract authorizations.

The total personnel assigned to combat forces will be the greatest since the completion of the demobilization following World War II, although the amounts recommended for 1951 will provide about 3 percent fewer officers and enlisted personnel on full-time active duty than at present. In 1951, it is planned to continue the organized units of the reserve forces at approximately the strength which is expected to be achieved by the end of the current year, but with better equipment, facilities, and training.

Military pay strength

Air Force	368	416	416	82	118
Total	1,394	1,547	1,507	860	979

Under these recommendations for the Army, this budget will provide 10 divisions, 48 antiaircraft battalions, and other combat and service units. Complementing the active Army will be the National Guard with 350,000 personnel and the Organized Reserves with 255,000 in regular training.

The Navy under these recommendations will operate an active naval fleet of 652 ships including 238 combatant ships. Six Marine Corps battalion landing teams will be maintained. A total of 5,900 aircraft will be operated by the active forces, and 2,500 by the reserve forces. Supplementing the Navy and Marine Corps will be 204,850 members of the Naval Reserve and 50,772 of the Marine Corps Reserve in regular training.

It is contemplated that the active Air Force will be organized into 48 groups and 13 separate squadrons, approximately its present strength. The Air National Guard and Air Force Reserve will be organized into 27 groups and 25 base wings, respectively. A total of 8,800 airplanes, from trainers to heavy bombers, will be operated by the active Air Force, and in addition 3,400 by the Air National Guard and the Air Force Reserve.

Pay and support of active duty military personnel: The services of the officers and enlisted men and women on active duty will require 4.3 billion dollars, over one-third of Defense Department military expenditures. This will provide for pay, allowances, subsistence, travel, and clothing for the active forces at the new rates of pay and allowances set by the Career Compensation Act of 1949.

Operation and maintenance of equipment and facilities: Estimated expenditures of 3.3 billion dollars will provide for operating and maintaining the aircraft, ships and vehicles, the airfields, training centers, hospitals, depots, various headquarters, ports, and other stations. Most of this amount will be required for the pay of civilian employees in these activities. These employees constitute the bulk of the approximately 725,000 civilian employees expected to be engaged in the military functions of the Defense Department in 1951. This represents a substantial reduction from the 865,000 provided for in the 1950 budget.

Civilian components: I have consistently stressed the importance of the civilian components of our armed forces. The Army and Air National Guard and the Air Force, Army, Navy, and Marine Corps Reserves will require estimated expenditures of 696 million dollars in 1951, as compared with the 663 million dollars estimated for 1950. This will provide for the training of forces totaling 979,000, which approximates the number expected to be in regular training by the end of the current year. Continued improvements are planned in the equipment available to these forces and in the effectiveness of their training programs. In order to overcome a major deficiency in the program for these forces, I recommend that the Congress authorize the construction of additional armories and similar training facilities. Funds for this purpose are included in the amount estimated for proposed legislation.

In addition the Reserve Officers' Training Corps of the Air Force, Army, and Navy will necessitate expenditures of 44 million dollars in 1951 to provide a continuing source of junior officers for the reserve forces and a portion of the junior officers required by the active forces. This will provide an estimated 19,000 new junior officers in 1951, an increase of 2,000 over the estimate for 1950.

Research and development: The experiences of the last war clearly demonstrated the decisive importance in modern warfare of superior weapons and equipment and of the application of scientific research to the production of new weapons and techniques of combat. In peacetime, as well as war, scientific and technical advances here and abroad make possible continuing improvements in the performance of military weapons, and open to us and to other nations the possibilities of new types of weapons which can profoundly affect military concepts and tactics.

We must continue a broad and active program of military research and development. The research and development programs of the Department of Defense, together with the related programs of the Atomic Energy Commission, the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, and other agencies of the Government, have as their objectives to develop improved weapons and equipment for the modernization of our military forces, to exploit the possibilities of new types of weapons and devise defenses against them, and to stimulate scientific research likely to have future military applications.

Expenditures of the Department of Defense for research and development in 1951 are estimated at 606 million dollars, slightly less than in the current year. This amount includes the principal costs of the research and development activities, except for the construction of research facilities and the pay and support of military personnel engaged in research and development activities.

Aircraft procurement: Procurement of complete aircraft will require expenditures of 2.1 billion dollars in 1951 for approximately 2,300 airplanes, compared with 1.7 billion dollars for approximately 2,800 airplanes in 1950. The change in average unit cost reflects the increasing complexity and cost of individual airplanes.

The recommendations in this budget will provide for new contracts to be made in 1951 totaling 2.0 billion dollars, compared with 1.9 billion dollars in 1950. This contemplates that 851 million dollars of 1950 authorizations being held in reserve will be applied against requirements for aircraft to be contracted for in 1951.

Approximately 3.3 billion dollars of unexpended authorizations contracted for in 1950 and prior years will be carried forward into 1951. This carry-over, together with the contracts to be made in 1951, will provide 5.3 billion dollars of complete aircraft to be delivered and paid for in 1951 and subsequently. Under present procurement plans it is estimated that, in addition to the 1951 deliveries of 2,300 airplanes, approximately 3,100 airplanes will be delivered in 1952 and later years from authorizations provided prior to that time.

Construction of ships: Naval ship construction will require 293 million dollars of estimated expenditures in 1951. While no new obligational authority is recommended in this budget, the 1951 expenditures will be only slightly less than the 314 million dollars estimated for 1950. Various substitutions and adjustments have been made during the past year in the uncompleted portion of the shipbuilding program. In addition to work completed in 1951, 467 million dollars of presently authorized naval ship construction will remain to be completed in 1952 and later years.

Major procurement other than aircraft and ships: Major procurement other than aircraft procurement and ship construction, will require expenditures of 678 million dollars, a 50-percent increase over the estimate for the current year and more than three times as much as in 1949. This will provide, mainly, combat equipment for Army and Marine Corps troops, equipment for modernizing the fleet, noncombat vehicles for the three military departments and ammunition, torpedoes, and guided missiles. The substantial increase in expenditures in 1951 results largely from the sizable expansion in this program during the past 2 years. The new obligational authority recommended for 1951, totaling 755 million dollars, will be at a moderately higher level than 1950. This will continue the larger procurement program embarked on in 1949 and continued with increases in 1950.

Amounts included for combat vehicles, artillery, guns, and other equipment for Army and Marine Corps troops will permit substantial modernization of the equipment for the ready forces, and will reflect the progress of our research and development efforts. It will provide an orderly step in the replacement of the equipment left over from World War II which by the end of 1951 will be at least 6 years old and therefore in need of substantial improvements in design as a result of technical and scientific developments. The equipment for modernizing the fleet will give emphasis to the role of antisubmarine warfare.

Military public works: Construction of military public works will result in considerably smaller expenditures in 1951 than in 1950. This is largely because only part of the authorizations proposed in my 1950 budget were enacted. Exclusive of the construction for which legislative authorization will need to be made, 1951 expenditures are estimated at 182 million dollars compared with 299 million dollars for 1950. This will provide for such construction as housing for troops and their families, operational facilities, and facilities for research and development. The obligational authority necessary for additional projects not yet authorized by legislation are included in the tentative estimate for proposed legislation.

Industrial mobilization, service-wide projects, and office administration and finance, interservice of the Secretary of Defense: The Defense Department's part in industrial mobilization planning will provide for maintaining machine tools and stand-by industrial plants, for tooling of pilot production lines, and for placing educational orders, as well as for continuing industrial mobilization planning studies with industry. Expenditures for this purpose are estimated at 109 million dollars in 1951 compared with 117 million dollars in 1950.

Other Defense Department activities, largely of service-wide nature, will result in expenditures estimated at 382 million dollars, a slight increase from 1950.

Proposed legislation (including military public works): In order to provide for early starts on projects and activities for which legislation is proposed I am including an estimate of 372 million dollars for new obligational authority, the largest part of which is for military public works for both regular and reserve forces.

Unexpended reimbursements from mutual defense assistance program: The Defense Department receives reimbursements for some of the equipment which it takes from its stocks to ship to other countries under the mutual defense assistance program. The manufacture and delivery of equipment out of these reimbursements will, for the most part, not be possible before the following year. Hence these reimbursements will appear as credits in Defense Department expenditures in 1950 and 1951. As deliveries from these funds are made in future years, compensating increases in Defense Department expenditures will result.

Pay of retired military personnel: Amounts are appropriated annually to provide the cost of pay for retired military personnel. The expenditures of 345 million dollars estimated for 1951 provide this retirement pay for persons whose services were for the most part rendered prior to World War II. The Government is at present incurring obligations for future payments at a rate two and one-half times the current retired pay expenditures.

Stockpiling of strategic and critical materials: The stockpile program will provide the means for augmenting the supplies of materials expected to be available to us in time of emergency. Accelerated progress toward present objectives will be made during the year since available supplies have increased somewhat, partly as a result of orders placed previously to encourage new development.

I recommend 500 million dollars of new obligational authority for this program in 1951. This amount when added to the authority already available will provide total authority for deliveries in 1951 and later years of 1.1 billion dollars. Expenditures are expected to rise from 580 million dollars in 1950 to 650 million dollars in 1951.

The recommended new obligational authority will bring the funds for the stockpile to within 729 million dollars of the present total objective of 3.3 billion dollars. By the end of 1951, 65 percent of the stockpile will be delivered, and an additional 13 percent will be under contract for delivery after 1951. We will be nearer to our goals for the materials the supply of which would be the most susceptible to interruption, than for the stockpile as a whole.

National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics and other activities supporting defense: Expenditures for all other activities supporting defense will total 43 million dollars, after deducting 48 million dollars of net receipts in the defense activities of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Slight increases in funds will be necessary for the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics to move forward with its basic research activities in aeronautics. The funds for the National Security Resources Board will be maintained at about the present level, and the cost of maintaining industrial reserve plants by the General Services Administration will decline slightly. Other activities provided for include the Selective Service System as well as various defense activities of other agencies. The defense activities of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, having to do with rubber, tin, and fibers, will result in larger receipts than expenditures, mainly as a result of reduction of inventories.

Veterans' services and benefits

Expenditures of 6.1 billion dollars are estimated for veterans' programs, one-seventh of all budget expenditures estimated for 1951. The size of these requirements reflects the fivefold increase since 1939 in the number of living veterans and the new readjustment benefits provided for the World War II veterans, as well as the increases in rates of benefits and in services to veterans generally.

Most of the expenditures for veterans' benefits and services are not controllable by the ordinary appropriation process. Expenditures depend largely on how many of our 19,000,000 living veterans, and how many dependents of deceased veterans, apply and qualify for aid under some 300 laws. The variable impact of veterans' programs on the budget is indicated by the fact that expenditures for the fiscal year 1950 are now estimated 1.4 billion dollars higher than they were estimated a year ago. As a result, it now is necessary not only to request restoration of the appropriations for the Veterans' Administration eliminated by the last session of the Congress, but also to recommend additional supplemental appropriations for 1950.

Expenditures in the fiscal year 1951 are estimated to decline 825 million dollars from the level for the current year. In the next few years we should be able to see a further substantial reduction in budget expenditures for veterans' programs, as the temporary readjustment benefit programs taper off or expire under existing legislation. On the other hand, it should be recognized that permanent veterans' laws will necessitate high expenditures for many years. In particular, expenditures for pensions and for hospital and medical care will continue to increase from year to year.

I have called attention in previous messages to the responsibilities which our Nation has toward its veterans and to our efforts to assist them to resume as nearly as possible their normal places in our society. We have provided a comprehensive and complete program of special Government benefits for veterans of all wars—including extensive economic aids, education and training assistance, job reinstatement and preference rights, as well as extensive medical and other services. Veterans, as citizens, of course, are also benefited under the general programs developed in the last 15 years to maintain high employment and to advance the Nation's economic welfare.

Almost 2,000,000 veterans with disabilities incurred in the service, and over 300,000 families of veterans deceased from service causes, are now being assisted under the veterans' programs. Our primary long-run obligations in providing veterans' benefits and services are to this group. We must give them timely help to surmount the economic and physical handicaps sustained as the result of military service and to assist them to assume the full responsibilities of civilian life. In the last 2 years, substantial additional increases in compensation rates to dependents and to veterans of World Wars I and II have brought the rates to this group reasonably into line with the rise in the cost of living since 1939.

The remaining 17,000,000 veterans are practically all without service disabilities. The Government has made available liberal benefits to help all veterans of the two world wars make the transition from military to civilian life. The veterans of World War II, in particular, have received readjustment benefits to assist them in obtaining education, training, jobs, businesses, and homes. Most of the citizen-soldiers of World War II returned to civilian life 4 years ago and have had adequate opportunity to reestablish themselves in their communities. The original, sound purposes of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act have largely been served. Some of the benefits under the act have already terminated and the need for others, such as education and training benefits, is drawing to a close.

Veterans without service disabilities will continue to be eligible for liberal benefits under the permanent veterans' laws after the termination of temporary programs. At the same time, these veterans are eligible in many cases for benefits under the general social security programs of the Government. We now seek to improve and to broaden the general social security programs to provide protection against the economic hazards of old age, disability, illness, and unemployment. The social security proposals pending in the Congress apply to all the people, including veterans. In the pending bill to improve the old-age and survivors insurance system, veterans would receive credit for the period of military service during World War II toward benefits under the system. On the other hand, proposals are also pending in the Congress to increase greatly the special programs for veterans, who with their dependents now comprise about two-fifths of our total population. There is real cause for concern that we may overlook the close relationship of these two systems and superimpose on the general system of benefits an overlapping and unwarranted series of special benefits for veterans.

I again urge that in considering new or additional aids for veterans without service disabilities, the Congress judge their necessity not merely from the standpoint of military service, but also on the basis of benefits under the general social security, health, and education programs available to all the people, including veterans. Our objective should be to make our Social Security System more comprehensive in coverage and more adequate, so that it will provide the basic protection needed by all citizens. We should provide through the veterans' programs only for the special and unique needs of veterans arising directly from military service.

I am sure that our veterans are willing to share with other citizens in the benefits which can be gained for all through a positive program of economic and social advancement. They recognize that their best interest is inseparable from the best interest of the Nation. For a democratic Nation like ours can thrive only as all its citizens—veterans and nonveterans alike—are enabled through fair and equal opportunties to live as self-respecting, self-reliant men and women in a free and prosperous country.

[1] This budget also includes 160 million dollars of appropriations to liquidate prior year contract authorizations for hospital construction.

Readjustment benefits: By the end of the fiscal year 1951 it is estimated that under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act 8,000,000 veterans will have received education and training benefits at a cost of 12.9 billion dollars, and that 9,000,000 will have drawn unemployment and self-employment allowances totaling 3.9 billion dollars. In addition 2,400,000 veterans will have obtained 13 billion dollars in loans for homes, farms, and businesses under the Government loan guarantee program for veterans.

The average enrollment in school, job, and farm training courses under the education and training provisions of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act is expected to decline from 1,986,000 in the current year to 1,837,000 in 1951 and to require expenditures of 2.5 billion dollars.

The education and training program, however, is now considerably bigger than had been expected. The average number of participants in 1950 is estimated at 400,000 above the level anticipated a year ago. Largely because of this unexpected increase I shall soon transmit to the Congress a supplemental appropriation estimate of about 700 million dollars to cover the higher expenditures now estimated for the current fiscal year. The bulk of the increase is in schools below the college level, particularly in trade and vocational schools. While enrollment in other courses is decreasing, enrollment in these courses is still increasing and in 1951 is estimated to average 936,000—41 percent higher than in 1949 and 14 percent higher than estimated for the current fiscal year.

The continued expansion of enrollment in schools below college level, more than 4 years after most veterans have been returned to civilian life, raises the question whether this program still conforms to the original sound objectives of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act—to enable veterans to resume education or training interrupted by the war or to restore skills lost during military service. There is some question whether large numbers of veterans enrolled in these schools are in fact being trained for occupations for which they are suited and in which they will be able to find jobs when they finish their training. I have asked the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget to study this situation thoroughly and to recommend to me any corrective measures, administrative or legislative, which should be taken to assure that our expenditures for this program yield a proper return both to the veterans and to the Nation as a whole.

Since July 1949, under the terms of the "GI bill," veterans discharged from service remain eligible for unemployment and self-employment allowances for only 2 years after date of discharge. On the average 59,000 claimants are expected to draw allowances, estimated at 61 million dollars in the fiscal year 1951. This compares with an average of 1,400,000 veterans receiving allowances in the peak year of this program, fiscal year 1947.

Under the Government loan guarantee program, it is expected that 386,000 veterans will obtain loans, almost all for homes, amounting to over 2 billion dollars in the fiscal year 1951. The estimated outlays of 68 million dollars for this program are chiefly for the payment of the first year's interest on the guaranteed portion of the loans. Expenditures for losses on defaulted loans are now relatively small, although the contingent liability is sizable since the amount of the Government guarantees is now about 48 percent of the total loans. In addition to guaranteeing veterans' loans, the Government also purchases guaranteed mortgages held by financing institutions. (Mortgage purchases are classified under housing and community development.)

The "other" expenditures for readjustment benefits cover allowances for burial expenses of veterans, tuition and supplies for disabled veteran trainees, and Government grants for special housing for certain seriously disabled veterans.

Compensation and pensions: It is estimated that an average of 3,058,000 individuals and families will receive compensation and pension payments totaling more than 2.2 billion dollars in the fiscal year 1951. Beginning in 1951 disability retirement payments of 78 million dollars to 31,000 Reserve officers, shown in this item in prior years, have been transferred to the military retired pay account of the Department of Defense. Apart from this reclassification to national defense, there is an estimated net increase in 1951 of 99,000 in the average number of cases, and of 71 million dollars in expenditures over the current year, entirely for cases without service disabilities.

The 1951 expenditure estimate of 2.2 billion dollars includes 1.5 billion dollars in compensation for service-connected cases, covering an average of 344,000 families of deceased veterans and 1,981,000 veterans with disabilities. The compensation and pension total also includes 160 million dollars for subsistence allowances to service-disabled veterans in the vocational education and training program. Pension payments to an average of 732,000 non-service-connected cases in 1951 are estimated to total 553 million dollars, about two-thirds to living veterans and one-third to survivors of deceased veterans.

Insurance: The Government reimburses the veterans' life insurance trust funds for payments on account of deaths traceable to war hazards, and also pays directly certain claims to veterans who failed to meet the regular standards of insurability. The expenditures in the fiscal year 1950 include nonrecurring transfers of 413 million dollars to the national service life insurance fund arising from a resurvey of the Government's liability for such contributions. Expenditures in 1951 for insurance claims payable by the Government are estimated at 39 million dollars.

Hospital and domiciliary construction: Construction of hospitals to provide 37,000 new beds and additional domiciliary facilities, costing 872 million dollars, is now about one-third completed. By June 1951 it is estimated that three-fourths of the work will have been done. When this program is finished, there will be sufficient beds to provide adequately for foreseeable needs for all service-connected cases and a more liberal allowance of beds than at present for non-service-connected cases. Obligational authority already available is more than adequate to meet the needs of the program now under way.

Hospital and other services and administration: Current expenses for hospital and medical care are estimated at 590 million dollars in the fiscal year 1951. About four-fifths of these expenditures are for the in-patient care program, and in this program two-thirds of the cases currently are nonservice connected. A daily average of 138,000 patients in hospitals and homes is estimated for 1951, about 9,000 more than were cared for in 1949 and 4,000 more than in the current year. The other one-fifth of the expenditures is largely for the out-patient medical and dental care programs.

Other current expenses, which are chiefly the costs of administering and operating the nonmedical benefits programs and of general administration of the Veterans' Administration, are estimated to decline in 1951 to 269 million dollars.

Trust accounts: The national service life insurance and Government life insurance trust funds operate as mutual insurance systems on a commercial pattern, except that no administrative expenses are paid by them and the amounts held in reserve and as surplus are invested in Government obligations by the Secretary of the Treasury. Veterans of World Wars I and II and present servicemen now hold about 6,800,000 active policies in these two systems. Premiums and earnings, supplemented by Government payments of over 4 billion dollars for claims involving deaths and disabilities resulting from extra hazards of military service, have built up assets in these two funds to an estimated 9.7 billion dollars at the present time.

The Government life insurance fund has been on a dividend-paying basis since 1921. A special dividend of 40 million dollars was paid early in the fiscal year 1950. The first national service life insurance dividend, amounting to an estimated 2.8 billion dollars and payable to all servicemen of World War II who hold or have held policies, has been declared. Payments are now scheduled to begin shortly. It is estimated that 2.2 billion dollars will be disbursed in the current fiscal year and the balance in 1951 or later, as applications are filed. In the next few years a regular dividend schedule is to be established for national service life insurance. These dividends are not a budget expenditure since they are paid from the trust funds.

Social welfare, health, and security

The coming year will be an extremely significant one for the Nation's social security program. The decisions of the Congress on pending legislation will determine the direction which this country will follow in providing basic protection against the major economic hazards of old age, unemployment, illness, and disability. It is my strong belief that it is a responsibility of the Government to provide this protection, and to provide it in a manner that is consistent with our ideals of independence and self-reliance—through the already established and tested principle of contributory social insurance. This was the basic philosophy of the Social Security Act, in which the major role was given to social insurance, financed mutually by employers and employees, with benefits available as a matter of right without a means test. Public assistance was given only a supplementary role to fill in the diminishing gaps in insurance protection.

The effects of our failure in recent years to carry out this philosophy are already dramatized by the increase in the public assistance rolls. Because the protection of social insurance is so limited and inadequate, far too many people have been forced to seek public relief. In some States, for example, half the aged people are on the relief rolls. Approximately 2,700,000 aged people and 1,500,000 dependent children now receive public assistance. By contrast, only 1,900,000 aged persons receive insurance benefits and 800,000 children and their mothers receive survivors benefits under the old-age and survivors insurance system. Average old-age insurance benefits are only 26 dollars a month compared with average old-age public assistance benefits of 45 dollars.

Public demand for some form of basic financial protection against loss of earning power is evident in the keen interest of wage earners in industrial pension and insurance plans. There can be no question that our society can and should provide such protection. What I wish to emphasize is that the basic approach should be through a comprehensive public program of old-age, survivors, and disability insurance, rather than through a multiplicity of unrelated private plans, which would inevitably omit large numbers of the working population and treat others unequally. Private plans and voluntary insurance can then provide desirable supplemental protection.

I urge that the Congress enact legislation to expand and improve the old-age and survivors insurance system in accordance with the recommendations made last spring. Specifically, nearly all gainfully employed people, including farmers and the self-employed, should be covered; benefits should be increased sharply; and disability should be added to the risks covered. It is also important that the tax base be raised to the first 4,800 dollars of earned income, not only to reflect changes in wage levels since 1939, but also to bring both receipts and benefits to proper levels.

The recommended program will cover about 85 percent of all employed people, and will thus gradually reduce the need for public assistance. In the meantime, however, it is necessary to provide some help for those persons not yet protected by social insurance, as well as for those who would need public aid even with an adequate social insurance system. I therefore renew my recommendation of last year that the program of Federal grants to States for public assistance be extended and improved. The proposal that I submitted to the Congress last spring was designed to permit Federal sharing in the cost of aid to needy persons excluded from the present program, as well as in the cost of essential medical and welfare services. It was also designed to make Federal grants more responsive to the financial resources of each State. Within the framework of general policy under the Social Security Act, the States are responsible for determining the size of benefit payments and the eligibility of individuals for assistance. In adopting amendments to the present program, we should continue to rely on the States to bear a considerable share of the financial responsibility.

In the field of health, I presented a set of recommendations to the Congress on April 22, 1949, outlining in some detail a program for the Nation, centering in a national system of medical care insurance. Since that time, the extension and enlargement of the hospital construction program which I recommended has been enacted, and considerable headway has been made on some of my other recommendations. I hope that the Congress will soon complete action on legislation to increase Federal assistance to local health services. Strengthening of these is fundamental to our national health. In addition, legislation should be enacted to provide financial aid to medical and related schools to encourage the training of additional medical personnel. In the case of nurses, tuition scholarships and subsistence aids should be made available for training graduate nurses, and grants should be made to States for vocational education for practical nurses, to encourage more young women to enter the profession.

To fill in a major gap in our social security system. I again strongly urge the adoption of legislation providing for a comprehensive system of prepaid medical care insurance. This should be geared in with our other social insurance programs and financed predominantly by employer and employee contributions.

Action on these measures should no longer be delayed. We cannot in good conscience let our social security system remain in the blueprint stage, and allow relief programs to become our primary defense against want.

This budget contains estimates for all of my proposals. The greater part of them would be financed through special taxes, with receipts going into Government trust funds and payments being made directly from the funds. Social insurance benefits, by providing support for the aged and disabled and their dependents, help to relieve individual families, employers, and communities of this burden. At the same time, by replacing the present haphazard arrangements with a comprehensive pattern of social insurance, we promote the stability of the economy and preserve the self-respect of all our citizens.

My proposals will add an estimated 271 million dollars to budget expenditures in 1951, principally in the form of grants to States. Of this amount, 200 million dollars is for improvement of public assistance and 67 million dollars for health programs. These items, plus increases under existing legislation in these two fields, are expected to cause Budget expenditures for social welfare, health, and security to rise in the fiscal year 1951 to a level of 2.7 billion dollars, an increase of 417 million dollars over the current year. Aside from proposed legislation, the primary cause of the increase is a rise in grants to States for public assistance and hospital construction. Included in the total is 594 million dollars representing the transfer of pay-roll tax receipts to the railroad retirement trust fund.

[1] This Budget also includes 151 million dollars of appropriations to liquidate prior year contract authorizations.

I recommend again that the Federal Security Agency be given departmental status; its functions are so important to the domestic policies of the Government that the head of this Agency should be a member of the President's Cabinet.

Assistance to the aged and other special groups: Grants-in-aid to States for public assistance to the needy aged, the blind, and dependent children are expected to reach 1.2 billion dollars in 1951 under the present program, with the Federal share averaging about 52 percent of total payments by State and local governments to these groups. For some time, the number of recipients has been increasing and now exceeds 4,000,000 persons; it is expected to average 4,600,000 during 1951. Average benefits are also expected to continue their rise. As a result, Federal expenditures will exceed those for the current year by an estimated 55 million dollars. The budget contains an additional 200 million dollars as the first-year expenditure estimated for proposed legislation to cover all the needy and to put the program on a variable grant basis. The revised formula which I have recommended would relate grants to the financial resources of the individual States and would also permit the Federal share to be held within reasonable limits.

I am also proposing legislation to strengthen the Federal-State program of vocational rehabilitation and to provide additional opportunities for rehabilitation of the more severely handicapped. By enabling these people to become productive workers, instead of liabilities to their families and communities, we are enhancing our national supply of skills and productive ability. The budget includes 4 million dollars for the first year under the proposed legislation.

Railroad retirement insurance: The amount of 594 million dollars included as an expenditure in the budget is actually the transfer of special tax receipts to a trust account for payment of benefits to retired railroad workers and their survivors. Apart from credits for military service, the program is financed by taxes on railroad wages, shared equally by employees and employers. Under present law, the transfers of tax receipts to the fund must be made in advance of collection and thus interest begins to accrue to the fund before the taxes are collected. To avoid this payment of interest on money not yet received, the Congress should direct that these taxes be transferred to the trust fund when received, as is now done with the old-age and survivors insurance taxes.

I recommend also that the Congress revise the procedure for making Federal Government payments for military service credits allowed to railroad employees. Such payments to the railroad retirement trust fund should be made annually in the years ahead on the basis of claims actually approved as workers retire. As the law now stands, these payments are made in advance, without adequate relationship to eventual requirements for actual benefits. To cover such future claims, 193 million dollars has already been advanced to the trust fund. Unless the law is amended as recommended in this budget, further payments of approximately 33 million dollars will be required in each of the next four fiscal years.

Promotion of public health: Federal expenditures for public health are mainly for grants-in-aid to States and for research. Of the 334 million dollars estimated for existing programs in the fiscal year 1951, 213 million dollars is for financial assistance to the States for general public health services and for a wide variety of special State and local programs, including hospital construction, maternal and child health, tuberculosis control, and mental health. The increase of 75 million dollars in expenditures over 1950 for existing programs is caused largely by a rise in grants to liquidate prior years' hospital construction authorizations. This program is helping communities throughout the Nation to reduce the hospital shortage.

Because adequate general public health services are basic in our health program, I am recommending that grants for this purpose be increased by 9 million dollars, bringing them up to 23 million dollars, the maximum authorized under existing law. An additional 5 million dollars is included for proposed legislation to increase these grants beyond the existing ceiling. At the present time, most of the counties of this Nation lack, either wholly or in part, the basic local public health services which must form the foundation for our efforts to improve the Nation's health. The increase permitted by existing law will provide only a start toward meeting this serious deficiency. New legislation is, therefore, needed to remove the existing statutory ceiling and provide a sound basis for aiding States in the future development of adequate local health services.

Other proposed legislation is expected to add 62 million dollars to expenditures, of which 30 million dollars is for aid to medical education to increase enrollments in schools of medicine, nursing, dentistry, and public health, and 7 million dollars is for expansion of health and welfare services to mothers and children. Expenditures under pending legislation authorizing special health services to school children are estimated at 25 million dollars.

The direct research activities of the Public Health Service and the grants to individuals and institutions for research, teaching, and training, will require an estimated 47 million dollars in 1951, a moderate increase over 1950. No provision is made in this budget for further expansion of Public Health Service grants to medical schools for undergraduate teaching and for construction of additional research facilities on the basis of special disease categories. This anticipates early enactment of legislation for general aid to medical education, which would contain adequate provisions for aid to medical schools in meeting their costs of teaching and in constructing additional facilities. Such legislation would permit an integrated program of research and teaching at medical schools, which should be far more conducive to good results than separate financing for each major type of disease.

Trust accounts: Under the old-age and survivors insurance, railroad retirement, and Federal employee retirement programs, benefit disbursements are made from the trust funds and are not included in budget expenditures. On the receipts side, the pay-roll contributions for old-age and survivors insurance are transferred directly to the trust fund and not included in total budget receipts. Receipts and payments under the proposed health insurance program would also be handled in this manner. Railroad retirement taxes, on the other hand, are included in total budget receipts and are transferred to the trust account as a budget expenditure. The Government contribution to its employee retirement funds is, of course, a budget expenditure (classified under general government).

The money in these trust funds is invested in Government securities, and the interest earned is added to the principal of each trust fund. Accumulated assets now total 18 billion dollars.

Under present law, the old-age and survivors insurance tax rate advanced on January 1, 1950, to 1½ percent each for employers and employees. In view of the recommended increase in benefits and addition of disability coverage, I propose that the further tax increase to 2 percent each, presently scheduled for January 1, 1952, be moved up to January 1, 1951. The proposed legislation would raise benefits in the fiscal year 1951 from about 800 million dollars under existing law to approximately 2.2 billion dollars. Thereafter disbursements for benefits can be expected to climb gradually as claims mature. The 4 percent combined tax should produce revenues of approximately 5 billion dollars a year with employment at a high level, so that for the next several years reserves would continue to accumulate.

A period of preparation will be required to set up the health insurance system. I am proposing that in the meantime a small pay-roll tax of one-fourth of 1 percent each on employers and employees become effective January 1, 1951, to defray initial expenses. Setting up this tax will also make possible the establishment of eligibility and other administrative records.

Housing and community development

Last year the Congress adopted as the declared objective of national housing policy "a decent home and suitable living environment for every American family." Real progress has been made toward achieving this goal. Private enterprise, with extensive Government assistance, built a million new houses last year, more than ever before, and at generally reduced prices. Far-sighted new legislation was enacted, which gives practical support to private and local initiative in clearing slums and developing our cities, in providing special assistance for low-income families in cities and on farms, and in promoting better methods and lower costs for all types of housing construction.

Our task this year is twofold. We must continue to push ahead rapidly in carrying out these major new programs. We must also further improve Federal housing legislation. In particular, to close the biggest remaining gap, I am recommending legislation which will aid middle-income groups to obtain adequate housing they can afford.

Budget expenditures for housing and community development are estimated at 1.3 billion dollars in 1951. Of this total, almost 1 billion dollars, or about 75 percent, represents the current estimate of expenditures for mortgage purchases by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to support the private mortgage market. The Corporation will subsequently be reimbursed for its expenditures in buying these mortgages, either through collections or through sale to private institutions.

[1] Stand-by borrowing authority of 1,750 million dollars is recommended to become available in 1950.

[2] This budget also includes 18 million dollars of appropriations to liquidate prior year contract authorizations.

Most of the Federal expenditures for housing and community development, including mortgage purchases, are financed by public debt authorizations rather than by appropriations. The public housing and urban redevelopment programs will require relatively small appropriations in the early years, with substantial increases in later years. The Federal Housing Administration insures each year about 3 billion dollars in private home mortgages, but since this is an insurance operation it has only a minor effect on current Budget expenditures.

Federal Housing Administration: Almost half the record volume of private new housing now under construction is being financed with mortgages insured or guaranteed by the Federal Government, largely by the Federal Housing Administration, and also by the Veterans Administration (classified under veterans' services and benefits). By removing all major risks from mortgage lending, these insurance and guarantee programs make it possible for American families to buy housing on substantially better terms than they could obtain otherwise. About 350,000 other families now live in rental housing which was financed by Government-insured mortgages. In the case of both sales and rental housing, established procedures of the Federal Housing Administration, including inspections, provide assurance that recognized housing standards are met.

As long as favorable economic conditions continue, income from premiums and other sources will exceed expenses and permit substantial investment in Government securities to build up reserves against possible later losses.

In the past year the mortgage insurance program has successfully stimulated construction of rental housing and lower-cost housing for sale. I have already recommended additional legislation to encourage further the construction of lower-cost housing for sale. I shall shortly transmit recommendations to provide, on a permanent rather than an emergency basis, a more effective stimulus to lower rental housing. For both rental and sales housing, the new proposals would also provide needed incentives to construction of units of adequate size for family living.

Reconstruction Finance Corporation: Since last spring, the Federal National Mortgage Association, a subsidiary of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, has been making heavy purchases of mortgages from private lenders, of which the major portion is guaranteed by the Veterans Administration. These purchases have made it possible for veterans in all parts of the country to buy houses on the advantageous terms offered under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act. Substantial commitments to purchase mortgages insured by the Federal Housing Administration have also been particularly helpful in assuring the availability of adequate funds for rental housing construction.

The continuing need for a stand-by secondary market does not mean that Government purchases should be regarded as a permanent substitute for private financing. Accordingly, the administration of this program will be directed toward encouraging private lenders to hold a larger portion of these mortgages as well as to repurchase the mortgages previously sold to the Federal Government. Important administrative steps are being taken but they can be only gradually effective, and substantial future expenditures will be necessary to carry through on the large volume of commitments already outstanding. Estimated commitments will exhaust the present authorization of 2.5 billion dollars shortly after the close of the current fiscal year. Because the rate of commitment is uncertain, I am recommending an additional 500 million dollars in public debt authorizations in fiscal year 1950 and 250 million dollars in 1951.

Prospective expenditures for mortgage purchases cannot be estimated accurately, since their amount depends largely on whether private lenders decide to hold the mortgages as permanent investments or to sell them to the Government. For example, the initial estimate a year ago of 200 million dollars in such purchases for the fiscal year 1950 was later revised upward to 1.3 billion dollars and is now reduced to 940 million dollars.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation also has special authority to lend up to 50 million dollars to producers of prefabricated housing and large-scale builders using advanced construction methods. I recommend that the Corporation be authorized to lend an additional 25 million dollars for these and related purposes. The accomplishments of this program to date have been below our expectations, but the potential benefits from the development of new housing production methods are so great that I believe a further limited investment of Federal funds, building upon the experience already gained, will yield good returns.

Cooperative housing for middle-income families: Even with these various Federal aids, enough private housing of the right types is not yet being produced generally throughout the country at prices which families with modest incomes can afford. As a necessary supplement to our other housing programs, I am recommending new legislation to authorize Federal assistance to cooperatives and nonprofit corporations in building and managing housing projects. Under the plan I am proposing, the Federal Government would provide technical assistance in organizing housing cooperatives and adequate arrangements for their financing. Through financial and other savings, material reductions in rents or charges are anticipated.

Because of the limited American experience with housing cooperatives, this program initially must be viewed as experimental, and cannot be expected to attain a large volume in 1951. With proper Federal leadership and assistance, however, it offers real promise that middle-income families will be able to help themselves obtain good housing at costs within their means.

Home Loan Bank Board: This Board supervises the operation of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Federal home-loan banks, and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation.

The Home Owners' Loan Corporation is rapidly liquidating the remainder of its mortgages by selling them to private lenders. During the depression years, the Corporation made more than 3 billion dollars in loans, thus enabling over 1,000,000 families to keep their homes. By the end of the fiscal year 1951, all of these loans will be repaid or sold.

Savings and loan associations supervised by the Federal home-loan banks provide roughly a third of all home-mortgage financing. The share accounts of most of these associations are insured by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. The favorable experience of these associations in recent years has permitted the Corporation to build up reserves against possible future losses. To further protect investors in these associations in the event of future emergency, I again recommend legislation to provide, on a stand-by basis, authority for both the Federal home-loan banks and the Insurance Corporation to borrow from the Treasury. These provisions, which should become effective in 1950, would be roughly comparable to the Federal assistance already available for the commercial banking system. As in the case of the banking system, moreover, they should be accompanied by measures to authorize more rapid repayment of the Federal Government's investment in these institutions, and to provide more effective and specific authority for the Home Loan Bank Board to regulate lending by the member institutions.

Farm housing: During the first 2 years of the new farm housing program, about 40,000 low-income farmers will receive help in obtaining better housing. In 1951, the Department of Agriculture will lend an estimated 45 million dollars, as well as provide general technical assistance and some direct grants for farm repairs and improvements.

Public housing programs: The Public Housing Administration and local housing authorities throughout the country have been taking the steps necessary to get the new low-rent public housing program promptly under way. Preliminary loans have already been authorized to assist 227 communities plan projects which will comprise an estimated 220,000 dwelling units.

Our goal is to have 175,000 units under construction or completed by the end of the fiscal year 1951. Most of the Federal expenditures during this period will be for temporary loans for planning, site acquisition, and initial construction. Private funds will be used for much of the construction financing and nearly all of the permanent financing. The Federal Government indirectly guarantees the local housing authority obligations issued for these purposes by contracting to pay annual contributions sufficient to maintain the low rents required for the projects.

In addition, the Public Housing Administration supervises the management and disposition of 450,000 permanent and temporary housing units constructed to meet emergency war and veterans' needs. In the fiscal year 1951, an estimated 20,000 permanent units will be sold and 38,000 temporary units will be transferred to local agencies or demolished. This disposition of both types of housing can be accelerated if the Congress enacts the amendments to basic legislation which I have previously recommended. Expenditures of these programs are more than covered by receipts from sales and rentals; in addition to covering current expenses, receipts from sales and rentals will result in 62 million dollars in miscellaneous receipts to the Treasury in the fiscal year 1951.

General housing aids: Under recent legislation, the Housing and Home Finance Administrator is initiating the comprehensive program of housing research which I have long advocated as a necessity to achieve our national housing objective. The long-range objective of this program is to improve knowledge about housing in order to aid in cost reduction and in stimulating the increased and sustained production of housing. Emphasis is being placed upon development of research plans with full participation by other interested public and private groups, so as to assure the maximum possible utilization of existing information and research facilities.

Slum clearance and community development: Orderly development and redevelopment of our cities and metropolitan areas is essential if we are to realize the full potential growth in production and living standards in the decades to come. Each city clearly has the primary responsibility for initiating and carrying through the far-reaching reconstruction plans required to meet its peculiar needs.

Under the provisions of the new slum clearance and community redevelopment program, the Federal Government now can provide financial assistance needed to augment local resources. Actual development will necessarily proceed gradually, area by area, with carefully planned provision for the housing of families displaced from slum areas and for the uses most appropriate for the redeveloped areas. For the first 2 years of the program, Federal expenditures will comprise loans to local public agencies to help them prepare plans and begin acquisition of sites. When acceptable local project plans are presented, the Federal Government contracts to pay a maximum of two-thirds of all net project costs. Contracts for loans and grants up to 325 million dollars for the fiscal year 1951 are authorized in the basic statute. The grants will not actually be paid until several years hence when the land assembly projects are completed, the redeveloped land sold or leased, and net project costs finally determined.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation will continue to lend to public agencies for transit lines, tunnels, and other self-liquidating projects in cases where private financing is not initially available on reasonable terms. Private refinancing last year of the large outstanding loan to the Triborough Bridge and Tunnel Authority has made sufficient funds available to finance the new commitments currently anticipated.

Under legislation enacted last year, the General Services Administration is again making advances to State and local governments for public works planning. These advances are repayable when the actual construction occurs. The 2-year program of 100 million dollars will permit preparation of plans for public works estimated to cost more than 3 billion dollars. Every effort is being made to achieve proper coordination in the planning of Federal, State, and local public works and to emphasize projects most appropriate in the event of possible economic emergencies.

Major disasters in the future as in the past will from time to time require prompt Federal assistance to stricken communities. I again urge enactment of pending legislation to provide in advance adequate funds to meet such needs.

Education and general research

If education and research are to play their full role in strengthening our democratic society, we must expand our basic research, we must devise types of education that will prepare youth more effectively for participation in modern society, and we must provide better educational opportunities for more of our people.

It is predominantly a responsibility of all government—local, State, and Federal—to provide for the education of our citizens. The Federal Government for many years has given financial aid to special aspects of education, such as vocational education, and to institutions for special groups, such as Howard University. It has become increasingly evident that Federal support of a more general character is needed if satisfactory educational opportunities are to be made available for all. The Nation cannot afford to waste human potentialities, as we are now doing, by failing to provide adequate elementary and secondary education for millions of children and by failing to help hundreds of thousands of young people who could benefit from higher education.

The importance of this need requires that we provide substantial Federal assistance to States for general educational purposes and for certain other important programs in this field.

To progress toward these objectives, this Budget includes expenditures for education and general research (not including large amounts in veterans, national defense, and other categories) of 434 million dollars in the fiscal year 1951, compared with 125 million dollars in 1950. More than three-fourths is for grants to States. The increase is entirely accounted for by the additional expenditures in 1951 resulting from the new legislation I am recommending. This legislation will entail a further moderate increase in later years.

Promotion of education—Elementary and secondary: The high mobility that characterizes our people means that no State is immune to the effects of ignorance and illiteracy in other States. The welfare of the Nation as a whole demands that the present educational inequalities be reduced. Educational inequalities are primarily due to differences in the financial resources of States and localities. Income per capita in some States is less than half as great as in others. The States with the lowest incomes have the greatest proportion of school-age children and are unable to finance a fair educational opportunity even with greater effort in terms of tax burden.

School enrollments in practically every State have risen recently and will continue to rise owing to the increased birth rate. Millions of our children are now taught in overcrowded classrooms. For others education is provided only on a part-time basis. At the very time when we need more and better teachers, schools must still employ tens of thousands whose qualifications do not meet the standards necessary to provide a satisfactory quality of teaching. Because salaries are generally inadequate, too few capable young people are preparing to enter the teaching profession.

For these reasons I urge the Congress to complete legislative action to permit the Federal Government to aid the States in support of the maintenance and operation costs of a basic minimum program of elementary and secondary education. The Budget provides for beginning this aid in the fiscal year 1951.

[1] Less than one-half million dollars.
[2] This Budget also includes 2 million dollars of appropriations to liquidate prior year contract authorizations.

There is a shortage of school buildings in many parts of the country due to the wartime deferment of construction and the increase in the school-age population. In many localities the need for facilities results from the sudden and substantial impact of Federal activities. I recommend that the Congress enact legislation providing for grants to States for surveys of their need for facilities and their resources, and grants for the construction of buildings in those particular areas where Federal activities have been responsible for increased enrollments.

For a number of years several Federal agencies, under separate authorizations, have been helping to finance the education of children living on Federal property and in communities affected by Federal activities. I recommend that the Congress enact general legislation to establish a single program for all Federal agencies.

Promotion of education—Higher education: Large numbers of young people and adults wish to continue their education beyond high school in order to prepare for entrance to professional schools, to receive additional technical or vocational training or to round out their general education. For many of our people, postsecondary education on a part-time or full-time basis, provided in institutions located within commuting distance of home, would meet their needs at low cost. Several of the States are now developing community institutions for this purpose. I have asked the Federal Security Administrator to make a comprehensive study of this development in order to determine whether the Federal Government might appropriately take any action to encourage the States and localities to establish and expand "community colleges."

Primarily because of low family incomes and of the high costs involved, more than half of our young people who could benefit from a college education are now unable to attend. This failure to develop to the fullest extent the capacities of our young people is a matter of national concern. As a step toward correcting this situation, I shall transmit to the Congress a legislative proposal to authorize a limited Federal program to assist capable youth who could not otherwise do so to pursue their desired fields of study at the institutions of their choice.

This Budget includes 1 million dollars as a tentative estimate of appropriations needed in the fiscal year 1951 to establish the required organization and to initiate the program. Assistance to students would begin in the fiscal year 1952.

National Science Foundation: The Government is investing hundreds of millions of dollars in research—primarily in applied research in the military, atomic energy, and health fields. We must consider, however, not only the ways in which the great reservoir of scientific knowledge already at our disposal can best be utilized, but also the best paths to follow for the discovery of further basic knowledge. To this end, we urgently need a National Science Foundation to stimulate basic research and to assure an effective balance among the Federal research programs. By developing a national research policy and by formulating a truly national research budget it should be possible to relate the activities of public and private institutions in a concerted effort to advance the frontiers of knowledge. The Budget provides 500 thousand dollars for the initial administrative expenses of the proposed National Science Foundation, in the expectation that the Congress will enact legislation, already passed by the Senate, to establish it.

Seventeenth decennial census: The seventeenth decennial census of population, housing, and agriculture, to be taken this year, will provide basic data essential to important decisions by businessmen, governments, and other groups throughout the Nation. Expenditures for the census, estimated at 45 million dollars in 1950, will drop to 33 million dollars in 1951, and continue to decrease in succeeding years as tabulation and publication of the results are completed.

Agriculture and agricultural resources

American agriculture is in a period of transition from the peak production requirements of the war and immediate postwar years to the normal requirements of a peacetime economy. During the war, every effort was made to increase agricultural production to meet the needs of our war economy and of our allies. In some cases desirable long-run goals for conservation of soil resources were deferred in the effort to increase production and to minimize the manpower requirements in agriculture. War dislocations and crop shortages abroad created an abnormal export demand for food grains and a few other farm products, financed largely by United States foreign relief and aid programs. In the next few years, this abnormal demand can be expected to adjust to a more normal level and distribution pattern for world trade.

Although this transition from war to peacetime needs has caused a decline in farm prices and a loss in farm income, the operation of Government price supports has served to cushion the decline and has been a major factor in preventing a serious postwar recession in the economy as a whole. The resulting benefits to workers and employers, as well as to farmers, have been many times the outlay of Federal funds. As the necessary adjustments in agriculture are completed, we should look forward to a reduction in budgetary expenditures for this purpose. The need for food and fiber products will continue to expand as our national income and population increase. Production on existing land, however, must be gradually shifted from the grains and cotton to livestock and dairy production, permitting marginal lands, whose soil is in danger of loss from erosion of wind and water, to be put back into pasture and soil-conserving crops. It is important that Government programs facilitate these adjustments within agriculture as well as between agriculture and the rest of the economy.

[1] Additional borrowing authority of 2 billion dollars is recommended, to become available in the fiscal year 1950.
[2] Less than one-half million dollars.

Federal agricultural programs, in addition to promoting adjustments in agriculture and stimulating conservation of soil resources, are designed to improve the efficiency of farm production, to provide low-income farmers an opportunity to improve their economic status, to assure farmers generally a reasonable stability in farm income, and to improve the level of rural living.

Total Federal expenditures for agriculture and agricultural resources increased from 2.5 billion dollars in 1949 to an estimated 2.7 billion dollars in 1950. Both years reflect the operation of price-support programs as farm prices declined. A decrease of 465 million dollars is expected in 1951, resulting from smaller outlays on price supports as acreage allotments and marketing quotas serve to reduce production of some 1950 crops, particularly cotton and corn.

Price support: Net outlays of the Commodity Credit Corporation amounted to 1.6 billion dollars in 1949. This was the first year since before the war that mandatory price supports have resulted in large cash expenditures and the accumulation of loans and inventories in the hands of the Corporation. Expenditures in 1950, estimated at 1.5 billion dollars, will be largely for corn and cotton, with smaller outlays for peanuts, rice, tobacco, milk and milk products, potatoes, beans, cottonseed, linseed oil, and various other products. Approximately 90 million dollars of the expenditures will be for construction of new grain-storage facilities.

In 1951, estimated Commodity Credit Corporation expenditures decline to 952 million dollars because of the expected effects of acreage allotments and marketing quotas on the 1950 crops. In later years, price-support expenditures should decline further as production is adjusted to normal demand.

Estimates for price-support expenditures are, of course, highly tentative, since the actual expenditures depend upon many factors which cannot be accurately forecast, such as the volume of exports, the rate of domestic consumption, and the influence of insects and weather conditions on yields.

The operation of price supports has resulted in the accumulation of large inventories, particularly of cotton, wheat, and corn. These commodity inventories represent assets which provide insurance against possible crop shortages in future years. It is estimated that the financial requirements of the Commodity Credit Corporation in the fiscal year 1951 may exceed its present borrowing authorization. I recommend that the Corporation be given an additional borrowing authority of 2 billion dollars, to be available beginning in 1950.

Farmers' Home Administration: The Farmers' Home Administration provides management assistance to low-income farmers, and makes loans for farm enlargement and development, production and subsistence, water facilities, homesteads, and farm housing. (Farm housing loans financed under the borrowing authorization provided in the Housing Act of 1949 are classified under housing and community development.) The apparent decline in expenditures for the Farmers' Home Administration in 1950 and 1951 compared with 1949 is due to a shift in financing provisions. In 1949, loans were financed from appropriated funds, and all loans were shown as expenditures, with collections on old loans going directly into miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury. In 1950 and 1951, most of the loan programs will be financed by a borrowing authorization, and the expenditure figure will reflect loans less collections.

Rural electrification and rural telephones: On June 30, 1949, approximately 78 percent of all farms were electrified. As coverage is gradually extended to the remaining areas, Rural Electrification Administration loans for electrification will decline. Beginning in the fiscal year 1950, the Rural Electrification Administration will also make loans to rural telephone cooperatives and other independent telephone companies under recently enacted legislation. Loans for this purpose are expected to increase in 1951. Net loan expenditures of the Rural Electrification Administration are estimated to be 427 million dollars in 1951, compared with 355 million dollars in 1950 and 299 million dollars in 1949. I recommend that the Rural Electrification Administration be given new loan authority for the fiscal year 1951 amounting to 450 million dollars, of which 50 million dollars will be available for the rural telephone loan program.

Conservation: The Soil Conservation Service provides technical advice and assistance to farmers in establishng a sound program of farm management to insure adequate protection and development of soil resources. Conservation practices are also encouraged through the agricultural conservation payments program carried out by the Production and Marketing Administration. By the end of the fiscal year 1951, about 90 percent of the farms of the country will be in organized soil conservation districts. Progress is being made in the preparation and application of desirable farm management plans for the adequate protection of our soil resources, but still greater emphasis will need to be given in future years to soil and water conservation, including the Department's upstream and on-the-farm flood-control program, to reduce siltation in the downstream areas and to enhance the value of projects constructed by the Bureau of Reclamation and the Corps of Engineers.

Expenditures for the Soil Conservation Service and for flood-control work of the Department of Agriculture are expected to increase from 64 million dollars in 1950 to 68 million dollars in 1951. Expenditures for the conservation and use program and for administering acreage allotments and marketing quotas are estimated to be 314 million dollars in 1951 compared with 285 million dollars in 1950 and 182 million dollars in 1949. I am recommending that the advance authorization for the conservation and use program in the 1951 crop year, which will largely determine expenditures in the fiscal year 1952, be maintained at the 1950 crop year level of 285 million dollars.

Other financial aids: Under the terms of the International Wheat Agreement, the United States will export 168 million bushels of wheat each year for 4 years at a price not in excess of $1.80 a bushel. In return, importing countries have agreed to buy the wheat at not less than certain specified minimum prices. In the first year, the effective export price for United States wheat is $1.80. It is estimated that the Commodity Credit Corporation, through which the program is financed, will spend 82 million dollars in the fiscal year 1950 to bridge the gap between the $1.80 export price and the higher domestic market price. In 1951, such costs are estimated at 76 million dollars. The Corporation is to be reimbursed for each year's cost of the Wheat Agreement from appropriated funds. In 1951, an appropriation of 82 million dollars is recommended to reimburse the Corporation for the cost of the Wheat Agreement in the fiscal year 1950.

Additional financial aid is provided for farmers through the Sugar Act of 1948 and through the permanent appropriation for removal of surplus agricultural commodities. Expenditures under the Sugar Act depend on the volume of domestic sugar production for which sugar growers receive payments at the rates determined in the legislation. It is estimated that expenditures under the Sugar Act will be 69 million dollars in 1951. The permanent appropriation for removal of surplus agricultural commodities, established in 1935, provides a fund each year equal to 30 percent of customs duties. In 1951, it is estimated that 110 million dollars will be available in this fund.

Other development and improvement of agriculture: Included in this category are the continuing basic services for agriculture, such as research on crop varieties, livestock and poultry, and the production and marketing of farm products; control and eradication of insects and plant and animal diseases; payments to States for experiment stations and cooperative extension work; and the general overhead expenses of the Department. For 1951, I recommend legislation to strengthen the regulation of commodity exchanges by the Commodity Exchange Authority.

Natural resources

This Nation has learned in recent years what it means to have limited natural resources. Our soil, forests, water, and minerals have been drawn upon prodigiously to support two major wars and the rapid economic growth of our country. If we are to continue to expand production and employment we must use our remaining resources with the greatest possible effectiveness, following sustained-yield principles, developing resources as yet unused, and restoring where possible the resources we have depleted.

[1] Less than one-half million dollars.

[2] This budget also includes 500 million dollars of appropriations to liquidate prior year contract authorizations.

A large share of the responsibility for such action falls upon the Federal Government, with respect to both resources on public lands and resources in private ownership. Atomic energy development depends upon our pressing ahead with the present Federal program on a broad scale. Continued economic growth in large areas of our country depends upon steady progress in Federal investment for flood control, reclamation, electric power, and related facilities. The wisdom with which we utilize our mineral resources will influence our economic strength and security for generations to come. Continued public investment in these areas is a prerequisite in many fields to the expansion of the private investment which we want to encourage.

The dollars which the Federal Government spends on these programs are largely investment dollars. In many cases, such as irrigation, power projects, and the management and improvement of public lands and forests, the activities are wholly or partially self-liquidating. In all cases, economic benefits will accrue to the Nation for many years.

The 1951 budget provides for total expenditures of 2.2 billion dollars in this area, an increase of 373 million dollars from 1950. Over one-third of the total and of the increase is attributable to expenditures for atomic energy. The balance represents primarily the requirements of projects under way in the fields of flood control and reclamation. This budget provides for no new projects in these areas. Despite the large number of highly meritorious projects which have already been authorized for construction, we should not at this time add to the present high level of commitments. This policy is necessary both because of our over-all fiscal position and in order to provide the greatest possible measure of stability, under present economic conditions, in the rate of Federal public works expenditures.

Atomic energy: The United States is seeking both to develop atomic energy for national defense purposes and to realize the great promise in its use for industrial and other peacetime purposes. Our atomic energy development program is a large venture in diverse fields—scientific research, medicine, engineering, industry—and will continue to require substantial outlays in the next few years.

The 1951 expenditures include increased amounts for the production of fissionable materials and weapons, and for the advancement of the science and technology of atomic energy, including accelerated construction of new facilities and development of new types of nuclear reactors. It is principally through the development of new reactors to produce fissionable materials and radioisotopes, generate power, and propel ships and aircraft, that the Atomic Energy Commission expects to evolve means of utilizing for peaceful purposes the energy released by nuclear fission.

Land and water resources: We have learned a great deal in recent years about the extensive benefits which can be achieved by proper development of our land and water resources—including navigation, flood control, reclamation, power development, soil and forest conservation, preservation of fish and wildlife, and recreation. In the interest of sounder and more efficient programs in later years, emphasis in this budget is placed on more thorough investigation and advance planning, and on assembling more complete basic data. However, the framework of Federal legislation and administrative organization under which we are carrying on development programs is in many respects inadequate and obsolete.

In order to obtain a thorough review of the present basic legislation, I have created by recent Executive order a Water Resources Policy Commission, which will make recommendations later this year with respect to the broad policies which should guide Federal participation in the development, conservation, and use of water resources—both upstream and downstream—and closely related land-use activities. On the basis of these recommendations, I expect that it will be possible to propose up-to-date and effective policies for the Federal, State, local, and private efforts which are needed to make proper use of water resources throughout the country. Some changes in present Federal legislation can and should be made at this session of the Congress, but major changes should be deferred until the Commission's recommendations are available.

We also need to find more effective arrangements for administering Federal laws and programs concerning land and water-resource development. I have already recommended that the Congress authorize the consolidation of a number of Federal activities in the Pacific Northwest into a Columbia Valley Administration, and provide for its proper integration with other Federal agencies and with State and local responsibilities. In other areas also we should be alert to the opportunities for better administrative arrangements, building on successful experience in the Tennessee Valley and elsewhere, and adapting organizational patterns to the particular circumstances of different regions.

The activities of the Bureau of Reclamation and the flood-control program of the Corps of Engineers, involving the construction of dams, power facilities, canals, channels, and levees, will be limited in 1951 to continuation of work on projects started in prior years. Bureau of Reclamation projects now under way will require an expenditure increase of 64 million dollars in 1951. Expenditures required in 1951 to continue going work of the Corps of Engineers will increase by 77 million dollars over the 1950 total.

The expenditures by the Corps of Engineers and Bureau of Reclamation will result in materially increased power facilities in the next few years. In addition, continuing progress on the existing programs of the Bonneville and Southwestern power systems will result in a further increase in transmission facilities. An increase of 44 million dollars is recommended for the Tennessee Valley development, notably for expansion of power facilities to meet the growing needs of the atomic energy program.

Experience in recent years has shown that it may not be possible to meet the shortages of water, which are a threat in some areas, through our extensive water-resource programs. I recommend, therefore, that the Congress enact legislation authorizing the initiation of research to find means for transforming salt water into fresh water in large volume at economical costs.

Public lands and national forests: Over many years, our policy with respect to public lands and forests, now comprising over 900,000,000 acres, has gradually been broadened from one of disposal to one of management and conservation. The range, forest, and mineral resources of these lands have considerable commercial value and bring in substantial receipts; in addition they have important watershed, wildlife, and recreational value. In some respects, we have a long way to go before we shall be managing and conserving these resources to achieve their full use and preservation. We should plan to expand our rehabilitation, protection, and management of these resources in the years ahead; the 1951 budget includes increased funds for these purposes.

Mineral resources: The Bureau of Mines and the Geological Survey are carrying on important investigations and research in order to ascertain the extent of our mineral resources and the best means of conserving and using them. In view of the limited domestic supplies of many minerals, there is real need for increased exploration and conservation of strategic and critical minerals.

Through laboratory research and developmental work, including operation of demonstration plants, the Government has shown that some of our liquid fuel demands can be met from synthetic fuels produced from oil shale and coal. This budget includes funds for a continuation of efforts to improve synthetic liquid fuels, and to narrow the cost differential between synthetic and natural petroleum products.

Use of recreational resources: During the past travel season there were 32,000,000 visitors to the 181 national park areas. This number of visitors is the highest in the history of the National Park Service; it is double the number before the war. This heavy increase in the use of the park areas has enlarged the requirements for their management and protection. The increase of 9 million dollars in the 1951 budget for the Park Service will provide for additional management and maintenance costs and for some urgently needed construction.

Alaskan resources: Alaska is a land of large natural resources—forests, fish and wildlife, minerals, land, and water—which must be developed in order for the area to make its contribution to the security and economy of the Nation. The 1951 programs discussed above include 23 million dollars for the development of natural resources in Alaska. Developmental expenditures in Alaska under other functions—in particular national defense, transportation, and social welfare—will amount to approximately 162 million dollars.

Indian land resources: Large areas of Indian lands are rich in timber, oil, gas, and other minerals, the conservation and development of which should be related to programs affecting similar lands. As part of our general program for protecting their rights and for helping the Indians to become self-reliant citizens, funds are included in this budget for initiating the long-range program for the rehabilitation of the Navajo and Hopi Indians in Arizona and New Mexico. While the greater portion of the amount recommended is for essential construction of educational and health facilities (classified in social welfare, health, and security), provision is made also for expanded conservation and development of the resources of the reservations. Funds are also included for some expansion in conservation activities on Indian lands in other areas, as well as for additional health, education, and other benefits to the Indian population.

Transportation and communication

Efficient transportation and communication services play a major role in promoting the economic growth of our country and in assuring our national security. Throughout our history, the Federal Government has traditionally supplemented private enterprise in this field, wherever necessary to assure adequate services at reasonable cost. To this end, the Government provides basic facilities; it regulates economic and safety aspects of commercial operations; it subsidizes essential services which could not survive without Government aid. In the fiscal year 1951, an estimated 1.7 billion dollars will be spent for these activities, a decline of 212 million dollars from 1950. This assumes a reduction of the postal deficit to a reasonable level, through enactment of postal rate increases.

Most of the Federal transportation expenditures are for the provision and operation of physical facilities. Direct Federal expenditures for aviation facilities, marine navigation aids, waterway improvements, and roads will amount to about 600 million dollars in 1951. In addition, grants to State and local governments for the construction of highways and airports will account for 514 million dollars. Although these programs make important contributions to the development of our economy, over-all budgetary considerations make it impossible to proceed with them as rapidly as we should like. The 1951 budget recommendations have been held as close to the 1950 level as program commitments would allow.

The long-term interests of the general taxpayer, as well as the users of transportation, will best be served by the development of a balanced transportation system, substantially independent of Government support. It is essential that the various promotional and regulatory activities of the Government fit together into a unified transportation program aimed at achieving that goal. At my request, the Secretary of Commerce recently prepared a report outlining the major policy issues which need to be resolved in order to assure such a program. This report is now being reviewed within the executive branch, and I shall later transmit recommendations for any legislation or other action that may prove appropriate.

Merchant marine: Under the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, the Federal Government provides both construction and operating subsidies to the maritime industry, intended to offset the competitive effects of lower foreign costs. In the fiscal year 1951, operating subsidies alone are estimated to accrue in the amount of 63 million dollars, about five times the average annual level before the war. Shipbuilding subsidies have recently averaged close to 45 percent of the domestic cost of vessel construction, exclusive of national defense features financed entirely by the Government.

I am seriously concerned by the increasing cost of these existing subsidies and by the potential cost of new subsidies now being advocated. Our national security requires an efficient nucleus of merchant shipping and shipbuilding, adequate to permit such expansion as may be required by a future emergency. However, to limit the burden on the taxpayer, this subsidy program should be held to the minimum level that will satisfy national defense needs. In determining this level, full account must be taken of the availability of vessels from friendly nations in the event of an emergency. The existence of the North Atlantic Treaty provides a framework within which joint international planning of shipping mobilization may proceed.

[1] Less than one-half million dollars.
[2] This budget also includes 591 million dollars of appropriations to liquidate prior year contract authorizations.

The entire subject of Government aid to the merchant marine is now under active study by the executive agencies concerned. Until such studies are completed, we should proceed cautiously with existing subsidy programs, and should avoid commitments for any major new programs. The budget for 1951 has been developed on that basis.

Expenditure increases in 1951 for ship construction and for operating subsidies will be partially offset by reductions in other Maritime Commission activities. The maritime training program is being reduced in size, and consolidated at three locations. Authority for ship chartering, scheduled to expire on June 30, 1950, does not now appear to be required beyond that date. Expenditures will also be lower for the liquidation of wartime obligations.

Navigation aids and facilities: The safety of surface and air operations at sea requires the navigational aids, rescue stations, and other services provided by the Coast Guard. Expenditures for these activities are estimated to increase from 158 million dollars in 1950 to 181 million dollars in 1951. This increase is largely for the replacement of over-age aircraft, and for more adequate maintenance of existing facilities.

The 1951 recommendations do not provide for starting construction on any new river and harbor projects of the Corps of Engineers. Projects already under way will, however, require an increase in expenditures from 212 million dollars in the fiscal year 1950 to 243 million dollars in 1951, and a further increase in 1952.

I repeat most emphatically my previous recommendations for approval of the Saint Lawrence waterway and power project. Authorization of the seaway, with its related power facilities, is a matter of urgency for our peacetime industry and our national security. In particular, each succeeding year reduces further our domestic reserves of iron ore, and increases correspondingly the importance of the seaway as a means of economical access to the proven ore deposits in Quebec and Labrador.

Aviation: The Federal Government provides extensive aid, both direct and indirect, to civil aviation. This assistance, which is consistent with our traditional policy of promoting new forms of transportation, has made possible a spectacular development of air transport services, especially during the past decade. Although continued aid is required for the present, the industry should be expected to become increasingly self-supporting in the near future.

At present, direct financial assistance to the air lines is provided through air-mail payments, which are set generally at levels adequate to cover deficiencies in the carriers' commercial revenues. Subsidy is thus merged with the fair compensation for carrying mail, making it difficult to evaluate the cost of this aid in relation to its benefits. The recent rise in total air-mail payments—to an estimated level of about 125 million dollars in 1950—has made it increasingly important that the subsidy element be separately identified. I recommend, therefore, the immediate enactment of legislation to authorize the separation of subsidy payments from mail compensation. Such subsidies should be paid from funds appropriated to the Civil Aeronautics Board specifically for that purpose.

The standard by which subsidy rates are determined under existing legislation may itself merit review in the light of the industry's present stage of development. Setting subsidies on the basis of the carriers' revenue needs may weaken the incentives for managerial economy, thereby increasing the difficulty of effective regulation by the Civil Aeronautics Board. While a considerable gain in efficiency has been realized by the air lines since the end of the war, there are undoubtedly important opportunities for further improvement. The 1951 budget will permit the Civil Aeronautics Board to conduct more intensive investigations of air-line efficiency, and to develop operating cost standards. This should assist the Board in shaping its subsidy policies so as to retain, to the maximum extent possible, the normal business incentives for economy.

The continued growth of air transportation depends upon modernization of our airway facilities to permit safe and regular flights under all weather conditions. Expenditures for the development, installation, and operation of such facilities are estimated at 136 million dollars in the fiscal year 1951, 39 million dollars above 1950. Other activities of the Civil Aeronautics Administration—including safety regulation and airport grants—will require expenditures of 93 million dollars in 1951, 3 million dollars higher than in 1950.

Highways: Major development of our highway system is required to overcome obsolescence and to handle safely and efficiently the steadily increasing traffic loads. This is primarily the responsibility of States, counties, and municipalities. The Federal Government must, however, continue providing financial assistance to the extent necessary to assure a basic system of national roads, built to uniformly adequate standards. Under existing legislation, the Bureau of Public Roads is expected to spend 504 million dollars for highway improvement in 1951, mainly in the form of grants to States. Apart from the emergency relief programs during the depression, this will be the highest annual level of Federal highway expenditures to date.

All of the Federal-aid funds thus far authorized have been apportioned to the States, and new authorizing legislation is therefore required during the present session of the Congress. I recommend that such legislation provide an annual Federal-aid authorization for the next 2 years of 500 million dollars, an increase of 50 million dollars above the current level. Within this total, increased emphasis should be placed upon the Interstate Highway System, a limited network of routes which is of greatest national importance to peacetime traffic needs as well as to our national defense. The recommended shift in emphasis, and increase in program level, should permit a satisfactory rate of improvement for this System.

Postal service: Postal rates have not kept pace with increasing costs and, as a result, the postal deficit has reached excessive proportions. Since 1939, the average expense per postal transaction has increased by 67 percent, owing mainly to higher wage and transportation costs; in contrast, average revenue has increased by only 32 percent. On the basis of existing postal rates, the deficit for 1951 is estimated at 555 million dollars. Cases now pending before the regulatory commissions may result in higher payments for transportation, and hence may correspondingly increase the deficit.

The Postmaster General is exploring fully all opportunities for reducing the cost of the postal operation. Modernization of the motor vehicle service, and the mechanization of mail handling, are among the items receiving particular attention. I am confident that the steps now being taken will in the long run help to assure the maximum efficiency of the postal operation. However, the potential savings, if present service standards are maintained, appear small in relation to the prospective deficit; they do not reduce significantly the need for higher revenues at this time.

I have repeatedly urged the Congress to raise postal rates so as to bring them into line with postwar costs. The need for such corrective action becomes steadily more urgent. It is unsound and unnecessary for the postal operation to continue as a growing burden on the general taxpayer. Instead, the users of the postal service should as a group pay the full cost of services received. This requires that the postal deficit be limited to the cost of air-line subsidies, Government mail, franked mail, and other items properly chargeable to the general revenues.

Last year, the Postmaster General recommended to the Congress postal rate revisions designed to yield additional revenue of about 250 million dollars per year. Subsequent increases in employees' pay and in transportation costs have rendered this amount inadequate. I therefore strongly urge again that the Congress pass legislation to bring the postal revenue more in balance with the expenditures of the service. The only alternative to increased rates or a continued large deficit would be an undesirable reduction in the quality of services provided. As a longer range solution to this problem, there should be sufficient flexibility in the postal rate structure to permit at all times a proper relationship between revenues and expenses.

Regulation: Through regulation, the Federal Government seeks to assure the adequacy, economy, and safety of transportation and communication services. Although the expenditures required for this activity are relatively small, this is one of the more important responsibilities exercised by the Government in this field. The 1951 budget includes moderate increases for the regulatory commissions, to permit them to reduce backlogs of pending cases, and to meet new problems more promptly.

Finance, commerce, and industry

As part of its broad program for balanced economic development, the Federal Government provides a variety of general financial and other aids to promote the stability and growth of independent businesses. These are supplemented by regulatory action designed to remove monopolistic barriers to production and commerce. In addition, in two areas—exports and rents—it is necessary to continue, on a limited basis, wartime controls now in effect. Total expenditures in 1951 are estimated at 212 million dollars, of which net expenditures for loans to business will account for about three-fourths.
